Israel, Syria resume talks

Jewish Telegraph Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Syrian negotiators have resumed their peace negotiations, with American officials mediating the process.

The two sides are meeting at the secluded Wye Plantation in eastern Maryland, which is operated by the Aspen Institute and was chosen to provide a tranquil setting far from the reach of reporters. The parties have taken a New Year's break from their discussions.

Diplomatic sources in Washington were quoted as saying that the Syrians preferred to have an American mediator in the room at all times during the talks.

The sources said the Syrians rejected the idea of drawing up a declaration of principles, as Israel and the Palestinians did in 1993, which served as the framework for their historic agreement.

At the same time, the Syrian delegation was said to be coming to the talks with a full mandate from Syrian President Hafez al-Assad to negotiate and to be flexible about Israeli proposals.

Among the ideas Israel brought with it to the talks were economic development projects, addressing such issues as water resources.

Regarding the highly contentious issue of the scope of a potential Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, Israel's deputy foreign minister said last week that Israel would not agree to a key Syrian demand that it withdraw to the June 4, 1967, border that was in effect before Israel took control of the Golan in the Six Day War.

"That is not an internationally recognized border," Deputy Foreign Minister Eli Dayan told Israel Radio. "In the peace between Israel and Egypt, we based negotiations on the internationally recognized border. I' m not saying that Sinai is the same as the Golan, but there has to be some basis for talks."

Israel and Syria last held talks in June, when Syria broke off the negotiations because of an Israeli demand for early-warning ground stations on the Golan if its troops withdrew from the region under the terms of a peace deal.

Under the new approach being implemented during the latest round

Mourning a double loss

Phil Granovsky 1921-1995

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Businessman and community leader Phil Granovsky died on Dec. 24, from multiple causes, including leukemia. He was 74.

Granovsky was well-known in the Jewish community. He was former chair of the United Jewish Appeal, and was instrumental in bringing Operation Exodus to fruition. In 1977, he was world chair of Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal.

He had also been chair of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, a Jewish National Fund Negev dinner honoree, president of Wilson Heights lodge of B'nai Brith and president of Adath Israel Congregation.

Granovsky was recently in the public eye as one of the original members of the group that brought the NBA Raptors team to Toronto.

Please see editorial on page 8.

Born in Romania, to Russian Jewish parents waiting for entry visas to Canada, he came to Canada at the age of five, and grew up in the old Jewish area of College and Bathurst.

He was always interested in sports, expecially football and basketball, and was an accomplished sprinter, competing for

Jack Cummings 1922-1995

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jack Cummings, one of the most recognized and prominent figures in the Canadian real estate and Jewish community scenes for almost five decades, was remembered as a much-beloved figure following his sudden death Dec. 23, 1995, from a heart attack in Boca Raton, Fla.

He was 73.

Like all Cummings men, Jack was tall and a bit larger than life, cutting an imposing and instantly recognizable figure. He was remembered in equal measure for his charm, philanthropy, force of personality, keen business savvy, as well as for his commitment to the city's cultural institutions, the Jewish community, and his particular labor of love, Tel Aviv University (TAU), Israel's largest institution of higher learning.

In 1979, Cummings was the first Canadian to become chair of TAU's international board of governors for a six-year term.

At his death, Cummings was honorary chair of TAU's international board of governors.

He also continued to serve on the board of directors of The Canadian Jewish News and had served as founding chair of the Free Trade Talks Begin

OTTAWA — Canada and Israel are planning a new round of talks aimed at reaching a free-trade agreement.

David Berger, Canada's ambassador to Israel, announced last week that the two sides plan to hold three days of negotiations starting Jan. 6 in Tel Aviv.

Berger said it is uncertain if a free-trade agreement would include agricultural as well as industrial products.

Israeli Agricultural Minister Ya'akov Tsur opposes a resumption of the talks, arguing that a free-trade accord with Canada would harm Israeli farmers without bringing them substantial benefits.

But Berger said an accord could be reached despite Tsur's opposition.

Jewish Divorce Help Lines

TORONTO — Five telephone help lines have been set up across Canada for Jewish women and men who want a religious divorce, known as a get.

The numbers are: Toronto — 416-782-7999; Montreal —514 - 731-2365; Winnipeg — 204 -444 - 2366; Calgary — 403-252-0011; Edmonton — 403-488-5308.

ISRAEL

Arafat Challenger

JERUSALEM — The sole person challenging Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat for the leadership of the Palestinian Council has announced that if elected, she would cancel all the agreements reached with Israel.

Samiha Khalil, a 72-year-old Palestinian activist who will be going head-to-head with Arafat in the January elections, said the accords with Israel did not come close to achieving Palestinian national aspirations.

She further criticized the agreements, saying that they enabled Israel to have continued overall control of Palestinian residents in the territories.

Medal Honors Rabin

JERUSALEM — In the aftermath of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli government has issued an official state medal as a tribute to a man who changed the landscape of the Middle East.

The medal, now in the design stage, will be based on a portrait of Rabin by Amir Weinberg, which was selected by Rabin's widow, Leah.

MK Faces Corruption Trial

JERUSALEM — A Likud Knesset member is to be tried for allegedly misusing Jewish Agency credit cards when he was the organization's treasurer.

Meir Shetreet's parliamentary immunity was recently lifted by the Knesset House Committee.

Shetreet allegedly used Jewish Agency credit cards for personal expenses when he was treasurer of the body.

Labor Advances Primaries

JERUSALEM — Israel's ruling Labor Party has set April 17 as the date for its internal primaries, two months before originally scheduled.

All Labor Party members are entitled to participate in the primaries, which determine the placement of candidates on the party list submitted to voters in the national elections.

Those elections are scheduled for the fall of 1996.

Accords Signed

JERUSALEM — The president of the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan was in Israel last week for a three-day visit.

President Nursultan Nazarbaev was accompanied by a 110-member delegation, which included 15 ministers. During his stay, several cooperation agreements between Israel and Kazakhstan were signed.

In meetings with Israeli officials, Nazarbaev asked Israel for aid in developing his country's natural resources.

WORLD

War Crimes Charges

PARIS — A French court is set to hear arguments in March whether former cabinet minister Maurice Papon will stand trial for crimes against humanity.

Papon, 84, is accused of sending nearly 1,700 Jews to Nazi concentration camps.

The court, in the southwestern city of Bordeaux, where Papon was a senior official for the Vichy collaborationist regime duringWorld War II, will hear a French state prosecutor's report requesting that Papon face trial.

The debate, which will include defense motions, is scheduled for March 6 to 8.

MDA Gets Welcome

GENEVA — The president of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has indicated that he wants to welcome Israel's Magen David Adom into the worldwide organization.

Magen David Adom, or Red Star of David, the Israeli version of the international organization, has fought for years to be recognized by the worldwide movement.

ICRC president Cornelio Sommaruga said in an interview here that he is personally committed to Israel and that he would like to "bring the disputed issue to a satisfactory solution."

Romanian fascist network found in Hamilton

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A "fascist network" with an ideology that blends mystic nationalism, high religiosity, anti-Semitism and anti-Communism has taken root in Hamilton and is intimidating the local Romanian community, The Spectator newspaper reported in a five part series recently.

The Iron Guard is alive and well in the Hamilton area and is using a variety of front groups and organizations to push its views and recruit new Romanian immigrants to Canada, The Spectator alleged.

One former Iron Guardist who attended a camp near Hamilton told The Spectator that older Iron Guardists "bragged about the killing of Jews and political opponents in the movements's glory days leading up to Romania's entry into the Second World War as an ally of Nazi Germany. They blamed the Jews for all of Romania's troubles and urged the young recruits to return to 'finish the mission'."

The Iron Guard, also known as the Legion of the Archangel Michael, has been linked to two murders in North America including the 1986 slaying in Etobicoke of Cornelius Draga-Dima, publisher of a Romanian-language newspaper. No arrests were ever made in that case.

The organization is also tied to the Romanian Orthodox Episcopate in America that was once dominated by Archbishop Viorel Trifa, who had inspired an anti-Jewish pogrom in Romania during World War II.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said the newspaper series showed that "the Iron Guard lives. This worst of terrorist organizations still functions in the world."

Littman, who was cited as a source by The Spectator, said he began investigating Canadian links to the Iron Guard about 15 years ago after Simon Wiesenthal included in his annual bulletin a list of prominent Iron Guardists living in North America.

"Eight to 10 were in Canada and we began looking into those eight to 10 and developing files on them. We found they were leaders in their community.

"They took over by a process of aggressiveness. They don't give up and they co-opted the community for their respect," Littman said.

Several defectors eventually approached the Wiesenthal Centre "and said, 'for God's sake, do something about this'."

After several trips to Romania in the early 1980s, Littman compiled a list of names which were handed to the Deschenes Commission, which investigated war criminals in Canada.

Young, recent immigrants from Romania are especially susceptible to Iron Guard recruitment after they've been given a job and brought into community organizations, he said.

Among the allegations contained in The Spectator series:

- Two Hamilton-area organizations with links to the Iron Guard have received more than $140,000 in government money, including a $135,000 Ontario grant to expand a community centre.
- The Iron Guard is trying to rehabilitate its image, passing off its anti-Semitism as anti-Communism.
- Romanian security believed "Guardists in North America and Europe are constantly sending envoys to Romania and giving material and financial support to extreme right-wing groups in that country."
- A songbook used at a Hamilton-area camp contains anti-Semitic lyrics.

Toronto Star acknowledges ad breached its guidelines

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A full-page Chanukah-themed advertisement from Jews for Jesus in the Dec. 19 Toronto Star should not have run the way it did, concedes the newspaper's publisher.

And the ad contravened the Star's own guidelines on religious advertising, John Honderich wrote in a letter to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

As well, the paper's ombudsman admits that for the third time in three years, the Star's own rules on advertising of this sort were "breached."

The ad "should not have run in this form," Honderich told The CJN.

Asked how it slipped by, the publisher said legal advice was sought beforehand, "a decision was made [to approve it], and we're looking into that."

A dreidel in the ad, "and other aspects ... were questionable," Honderich added.

Both CJC and B'nai Brith Canada wrote letters of protest to the paper.

The ad, which also appeared in a full page of the Dec. 15 Toronto Sun, was headlined "A Great Miracle Happened There" and featured a dreidel, Hebrew letters and a coupon asking respondents to identify themselves as Jewish or gentile.

Congress reminded the Star that its own guidelines on advocacy advertising were implemented to prevent this kind of ad.

The guidelines state that "no advertising will be accepted which identifies one religious faith and urges its adherents to adopt different views or a different faith."

The rules were toughened in 1988 after the paper lost a case at the Ontario Press Council for refusing to run an ad for Jews for Jesus.

Congress and others have long held that Jews for Jesus and other so-called Hebrew-Christian groups target Jews for conversion to Christianity, as seen in their advertising, which almost always combines Jewish symbols with calls to accept Jesus as the messiah.

The ad was "particularly offensive," wrote Congress, "because of its underlying hypothesis that one religious group — the Jews — is so utterly lacking in prospects for salvation that they need special attention by way of a concentrated appeal that is clearly directed to them exclusively."

In his letter to Congress, Honderich said he found the portion of the ad inquiring about religion "offensive and in bad taste."

He said "broader consultation" should have taken place prior to its approval.

Honderich said the paper intends "to be more vigilant in honoring [its] advocacy advertising guidelines," and offers "our apologies for this regrettable lapse."

In his Dec. 23 column, the Star's ombudsman, Don Sellar, took the paper to task for its repeated failures to live up to its guidelines.

Two years ago, Sellar admitted that the paper violated its rules by accepting a similar ad from Jews for Jesus.

This time, the guidelines were "breached," he told The CJN, adding the paper received some three dozen calls of protest.

"Most offensive," he said, was the box asking people to identify their religion.

Sellar stressed, however, that he was not speaking on behalf of the Star.

Congress also sent a letter of protest to the Sun, which has no guidelines on advocacy advertising. The paper responded by saying the ad "should have been identified clearly."

Poet explains to us 'what it all means'

In 1965, sociologist John Porter published his most famous work in which he described Canada's society as a "vertical mosaic." Thirty years and a number of societal changes later, we hardly hear the term any longer, let alone use it in reference to the Canadian community. Thus, with due apologies to the late Porter, I shall appropriate the term as the most fitting way to describe the rich, inspiring inheritance of Canadian Jewish poetry.

Canadian Jewish poetry is its own vertical "mosaic," a literary ladder to heaven, as it were, firmly planted on Canadian soil, but lifting us through the middle air of daily travail, upward to the heady, poignant heights of Jewish life, love and lore. Along the rungs we encounter writers such as A. M. Klein, Miriam Waddington, Adele Wiseman, Melech Ravitch, Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen, Naim Kattan, Eli Mandel and Seymour Mayne. There are many more. One writer in particular is now helping to build and to secure that ladder. He is Shel Krakofsky. The CJN has featured some of his poetry in the past.

Krakofsky was born and educated in Toronto. He was an English teacher and a journalist with the Globe and Mail. He is now a physician living with his wife and three children in the farming community of Komoka, situated just a tad west of London, Ont. And of course, he is also a poet.

His second collection of poetry, Blind Messiah, has just been published by Moonstone Press. It follows by four years the publication of his first collection of poems, The Reversible Coat.

Krakofsky's poetry has been described by other poets and writers in various ways. Layton raves: "Shel Krakofsky's blazing lyricism grabs my soul by the lapels." Waddington observes: "His poems are skillfully anchored in the strength of modern Jewish reality. Religious without religiosity." And Mayne simply states: "Krakofsky's poetry is thoughtful, witty, playful and a pleasure to read." They are all correct, each describing a different aspect of the light reflected through Krakofsky's beautiful, many-angled, precious poems.

Krakofsky writes because, as all true writers, he must. His stories, his lines and his phrases must find their expression. Writing is as essential to his well-being as are movement, laughter and love. In an essay he wrote in 1992, in the inaugural edition of Parchment, a journal of contemporary Jewish writing which he edited, he defined the function of the writer generally, and of the Jewish writer specifically thus: "Historians like Irving Abella, Michael Brown, Stephen Speisman and Harold Troper have given Jews a sense of place, if not total comfort, in Canadian history. As the historians have told us how we got here and the sociologists have delineated where we are, it is the writers and the critics who have interpreted what it all means by choosing their characters and themes."

Being able to read Krakofsky's insights into "what it all means" is the sweet and incomparable delight of his poetry. For example, in Last Meal we read how he feels about the happy, unpretentious camaraderie of the seudah shlishit. of Saturday night.

Last Meal
(from Blind Messiah)

let my last meal be the third meal of Shabbat that includes the crumbs from a tzaddik's modest plate

let me pound a crippled table and sway with magic eyes singing Zemirot songs beside Isaac Luria and the medieval rabbis and dreamers of Safed

let us levitate in dance
"yedeed nefesh av harachamon. . ."
arms surrounding shoulders intertwined like Havdalah torch burning evanescent separating this week from the next
this life from the next let me rise with the aroma of the spice box

my palate scorched with Sabbath dynamite
a mix of herring, onions, chick peas
and biting rye

when this vessel can no longer hold the sparks from the sun's
the moon's pull let me depart exhausted from rest with wine on my lips passing Elijah on his way

His insights are often so accurate, they ache in our hearts as we reflect on them. He expresses the unburnished truths of human existence, and of Jewish existence especially, with rare, skillful, artistic, economy of words. For example:

Last Lines
(from Reversible Coat)

it's a waste to index the first lines
it's the last lines of poetry that
not the first

it's the last lines that should be remembered
not at the start on Yom Kippur
at Armageddon in business in prayer in poetry in death in love

it's the last lines that count
not the first

Or, as in Higher Mathematics
(from Reversible Coat)

when Jews become jews for jesus
the collective I.Q. of both groups goes up

This is how Krakofsky observes the quiet parental satisfaction of the Shabbat table.

Once a Week
(from Reversible Coat)

we sing Shalom Aleichem to the Angels sanctify the wine and challah bread and sit around the Shabbos table
(the children say, Shabbat)
this night robed with tablecloth

our children's excitement has diminished as they wait impatiently for the obligatory chicken and more current affluent delicacies
our former singsongs cancelled
Grace after the meal less frequent

the issues personal and public we still talk and laugh like no other evening they plan the rest of Friday night even some TV (Zaida, forgive me)
plus weekend homework visits with friends their futures

over exhausted candles
I smile through shadows at my grown and growing prince and Sabbath queens hoping it will not be long or painful until they discover that this used to be
as good as it gets

There is an indescribable exhilaration one feels on a mountain peak: the air perfectly translucent, the breeze cool, the light gold and brilliant, seeing the world to the furthest corner with rare clarity and insight, seeing oneself in that world, and occasionally even sensing a glimpse of heaven. Krakofsky's poetry can carry one to the top of a mountain. For those people who have never been there, it is an important journey and highly pleasurable.

Tory cutbacks threaten non-profit Jewish housing

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

On The Avenal's patio.

TORONTO — Tenants of about 1,100 apartments in non-profit housing in the Toronto Jewish community are worried about their future in the wake of the Ontario government's decision to get out of the subsidized housing business.

Also, though there is a huge waiting list, the government has not approved any applications for future non-profit housing in the Jewish community, according to Lisa Lipowitz, project coordinator for Kehilla Residential program, an affiliate of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"It's a very serious situation, we are very worried," said Stan Sugarbroad, a tenant at the Dorothy Klein Project on Roselawn Avenue. "With rent controls coming off, and a possible end of subsidies, there is concern about the future."

Whether rents will go up as the result of budget reductions is unclear until government policy is clarified, Lipowitz said.

About 50 per cent of the 1,100 units are subsidized, Lipowitz told The CJN. The total includes 50 per cent seniors, the rest being made up of people on social assistance, families, including single mothers with children, New Canadians, and persons with a physical disablity, some wheelchair bound.

The Kehilla is concerned with a government directive that tenants in arrears of rent face possible eviction, though no evictions have yet taken place.

"This is an uncomfortable thought for boards of directors who sponsored non-profits in order to assist those members of our community who require subsidized housing," Lipowitz said.

A predicted slash in operating budgets means that the standard of maintenance and care will be lowered because there will be less money to run the buildings, she said.

In addition to Dorothy Klein, the projects include three buildings operated by B'nai Brith Canada, two on Bathurst Street, and one on Torresdale, Reena Foundation, Ohr Somayach, Moshav Noam, Plaut Manor, Habayit Shelanu, Project Marc and the Avenel, the latter two sponsored by Kehilla.

"They are as diverse as the Jewish community itself," noted Lipowitz.

Of particular concern is the government reduction of 22 per cent in welfare benefits, while the rents for people on social assistance in these projects remains the same.

"We think the community should be aware of the tremendous hardship being imposed on some people by this government," said Lipowitz.

Another concern is a report that the government is moving to a system of shelter allowances, directly to tenants, instead of a subsidy system. "A fat lot of good that will do," commented Sugarbroad.

Rents that are not subsidized in the projects are linked to fair market values in the areas concerned.

Waiting lists are long because there is little turnover. In the Avenel building on Ridley Boulevard, for instance, where there are 111 units, applicants are told they face a delay of five to 10 years.

Government regulations require that at least 20 per cent of the units be made available to applicants from the provincial registry. In the case of the Dorothy Klein building this has resulted in 60 per cent of tenants being Jewish. About 80 per cent of the rents in the building are subsidized.

"The need for new housing is great now and in view of the cutbacks the need will be even greater in the future," Lipowitz said.

Veteran recalls a wartime Chanukah

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his blue coveralls spattered with antifreeze and his rubber boots dripping mud, Sol Friendly of Toronto was master of ceremonies at a most unusual Chanukah party in Eindhoven, Holland, 51 years ago.

Along with other members of the RCAF, the YMCA, Knights of Columbus and Canadian Legion, Friendly organized the party for Jewish residents, who, until December 1944, were hiding from the Nazis.

"A Jewish butcher in Eindhoven and I figured there would be 17 Jews at the party, but to our amazement 77 attended. They were coming out of the woodwork," Friendly said.

The reason his clothing was so dishevelled was that he had just helped to refuel aircraft and had to tramp through a muddy field.

"When I got to the base to pick up the other Jewish fellows, I was half an hour late and one of them said, 'What is this a party on Jewish time?' and they insisted that I drive them over without shaving and changing my clothes."

That wasn't the only unnerving experience for the Canadian airman who is a Jewish war veterans' representative to the Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region executive.

"A Jewish cook on the base heard about the party and made dozens of trays of pastries. I was driving a three-ton lorry and had to dodge the bomb holes in the road or else the pastries never would have made it."

The price of admission was two chocolate bars, and one unexpected guest was a Jewish RAF wing commander from London. A 5-year-old Jewish Dutch girl lit the first candle.

Friendly said he was able to get use of the truck and the cooperation of the recreational agencies on the base because he was a member of the rugger team.

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED. ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5 regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution.

Disabled doctor credits Beit Halochem for its support

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Eyal Gur

TORONTO — With a white lab coat over his street clothes, Dr. Eyal Gur walks confidently down the halls of the Hospital for Sick Children, where he recently began a microsurgery fellowship in the Plastic Surgery department.

The fact that he is an amputee comes as a surprise even to some of his medical colleagues. The 36-year-old Israeli war veteran lost his right leg below the knee in 1982.

At the time, he was an experienced captain commanding a select parachuting unit in Syrian-occupied Lebanon. Along with other Israeli soldiers, he was injured by anti-aircraft missiles firing at the ground.

Following rehabilitation at Tel Aviv's Tel Hashomer Hospital, Gur was windsurfing a month after his injury, he recalled over coffee in the Sick Kids' cafeteria. "I was young, I was healthy and in very good physical shape."

The initial adjustment was eased by an "incubator" of loving family and friends.

During his rehabilitation, he was visited by members of Beit Halochem, the Israeli organization providing support, counselling, therapy and recreation to disabled war veterans, but he felt no need to avail himself of the group's services.

The war veterans, also amputees, were members of Beit Halochem's competitive volleyball team — not a wheelchair team but "regular standing." Gur declined to join because he didn't want to identify with a disabled group.

Although he still downplays his disability, his feelings about Beit Halochem have changed.

About six months after his injury, Gur decided to try out the organization's Tel Aviv facility, one of four in Israel. He was looking for somewhere to swim, and Beit Halochem's American-style pool was available to him at no cost.

A strong swimmer, he was asked to join the team for 50- and 100-metre relay races. He also joined the volleyball team, which gave second-ranked local teams with able-bodied players a run for their money.

"The wonderful thing was that there is no feeling of anyone being disabled. They were all like me or worse physically, but everyone was very strong and very demanding of themselves," said Gur.

Both teams went on to compete internationally in the Paralympic Games in Seoul, Korea (1988) and Barcelona, Spain (1992). In Seoul, the volleyball team took home a silver medal and the swim team placed fifth in the finals.

As active as he was in Beit Halochem, Gur continued living a full life in the "outer" world.

A year after his injury, as planned, he entered medical school at Tel Aviv University. He volunteered in the army for 10 years in a planning role, travelled to Paris and the Himalayas, and had an active social life.

When he was single and in dating situations, he raised the issue of his disability early on. "There was never any problem," he said. "There was no reason for me to search for support anywhere else."

Now married and the father of two children, Gur works long hours to perfect his microsurgical skills. Despite his busy schedule, he has offered to participate in Beit Halochem Canada programs.

He credits Beit Halochem with helping him physically, emotionally and psychologically. "Even though you're with disabled people, you get a strong feeling of competence. It helps [you] be a better part of the outer society, not just the Beit Halochem society. I owe a lot to Beit Halochem."

Mendelson part of Metro's real Law and Order

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you're smart, you won't try to tell Mark Mendelson that he reminds you of Detective Logan from the popular television show Law and Order.

Not that he's got anything against Chris Noth, the actor who played the fictional TV character. Like his TV counterpart, Mendelson is tall and lanky, and he too has the air of cynicism and savvy that comes from peering beneath too many slimy rocks in the Toronto underworld.

Profile

But unlike Noth, Mendelson is a real cop, a detective in the homicide unit of the Metro Toronto Police force. And he dislikes Law and Order with a passion. It fails to portray the gritty, grinding detective work that is part and parcel of real-life homicide investigations.

"Witnesses fall out of the ceiling tiles for those guys," he says with disdain.

So what TV show or movie best depicts the real life drama of a cop at work?

"Barney Miller is about as realistic to police work as I've ever seen. They're just real police dealing with real people," he said.

In an interview from the homicide section at police headquarters on College Street — where the radiators don't rattle and the air conditioning works — Mendelson described what it's like trying to collar society's most despised desperadoes.

"There's a whole different world out there that people who sit at home in the suburbs don't even realize. There's a world of drugs, money and violence.

"A lot of murders, if you track them back from the scene of the crime, have a drug influence.

"I dealt with 13 straight murders that all had some involvement with crack [cocaine]."

A homicide detective since 1991, Mendelson revels in his job, which is considered the pinnacle of prestige among police officers.

"Here, you're supposed to be the best. This office has tremendous pride" and lots of recognition by police forces around the continent, he said.

Altogether, there are only about 28 homicide detectives on the force, and to join that elite brotherhood, a majority vote of the serving officers is required.

"There's a certain standard of professionalism required," because murder is the most serious of crimes and detectives face the most experienced and capable defence lawyers in court, Mendelson said.

Unlike the situation depicted in Law and Order, investigations often take a lot of time.

In the past, most murders were committed by people who knew the victim, and detectives operated under the premise that "it's always safe to start at the home and work your way out. Essentially, it's a process of elimination.

"Everyone related to the deceased may have a little piece of the puzzle. They may not think it's of great investigative value, but to us, it's a piece of the puzzle and [helps create] the bigger picture."

Forensic evidence like fingerprints or DNA samples is important, "but I think the bottom line is that you have to go with your gut reaction."

Worked on 40 homicides

Since joining the unit, Mendelson has worked on 40 homicides, including some high profile ones: the murder of Simone Sandler, who was last seen on Yonge Street looking for movie extras; the shooting at an after-hours club in which one person died and in which the patrons all claimed to be in the washroom or didn't see anything; the ongoing investigation of the murder of Marsha and Tami Ottey, sisters who were found slashed and stabbed in the basement of their Scarborough home.

"When you knock on someone's door at 3 a.m. and tell them their daughter's been murdered and you're responsible for finding the perpetrator, you're taking on a tremendous responsibility ... The parents look on you as the only person who can put their disaster to rest."

Mark Mendelson

You can be called to a crime scene at 3 a.m. or 4 p.m. and 90-hour weeks are not unusual.

"At 38, I've got grey hair," he said.

After 20 years as a cop, Mendelson says very little surprises him any more. "I've [investigated] people killed for $20 worth of crack cocaine or people who have killed because they feel they've been disrespected," he said.

As a teen, Mendelson had no plans for joining the force. Back when he played drums in a rock 'n roll band called Impulse, two friends told him they were planning to apply to join the police and asked if he'd join them. Mendelson, who was attracted by the excitement of the job and the chance to work with people, agreed.

While the others never became cops — one is a teacher, the other ended up in the crowbar hotel — Mendelson began as a uniformed officer in 52 Division downtown.

After three years on the beat, he was promoted to work as an undercover narcotics officer.

Although he's had guns pointed at him and was grilled to see if he was a cop, Mendelson today says "I wouldn't call it dangerous. It was different. There you had to take on different personalities and mingle with people you normally wouldn't have to deal with."

Most of the dealers "packed a piece" and he was searched often to see if he was armed or carrying a microphone.

One incident still brings a smile to his face: "I got burned once by a girl who I went to high school with. She came up to us in a bar, said 'Hi, are you still a cop?' "

The dealer panicked, bolted and "ran straight through a plate glass window." The attending officers nabbed the suspect and he was convicted of trafficking.

Of his time as a narc, Mendelson said, "It was something I could hardly wait to get into. It was something I could hardly wait to get out of."

After leaving narcotics, he was teamed with Doug Bowerman and from 1983 to 1987, the two formed the first ethnic unit of the Metro Police. Their job was to liaise with the Jewish community, investigate racially-motivated incidents, examine hate literature and gather information about anti-Semitic groups.

Mendelson said part of their duty was to provide security for pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel at his preliminary hearing and 1985 trial.

"It wasn't easy being a Jewish policeman and ensuring Zundel's safety. It put me into an ironic position ... I'm six-three and I remember a five-foot, elderly person jumping over my back at Old City Hall trying to get at Zundel. Their emotion must have been overwhelming."

The ethnic unit was assigned that particular duty "because we knew all the players from both sides and the lines of communications were all there."

He believes the ethnic unit was Toronto's first example of community-based policing, the latest trend in law enforcement.

In 1987, he was promoted from constable to sergeant and assigned to supervise a group of uniformed constables working out of 53 Division at Yonge and Eglinton.

Another promotion followed in 1989, when he was made detective and given the reins over the major crime unit at 53 Division, investigating sexual assaults, drug sales, break and enters, robberies and stolen car rings.

He was even "promoted" to "policeman" by his B'nai Brith hockey team. "Whenever there was a fight, they said, 'Mark, go straighten it out.' You can't throw an orthodontist in there. A chiropractor won't go.

"B'nai Brith non-contact hockey was the most violent experience I've ever encountered," he said.

In 1991, he was promoted to homicide. Mendelson acknowledged that with a constant diet of crime scenes and autopsies, and a clear view of the "underside of the city," many homicide detectives suffer from burn-out.

But one of the most gratifying aspects of police work comes "when a jury looks at a judge and says, 'Guilty.' Then you can say, there's been closure."

Correction

In our Dec. 21 story, titled "Author outlines West's 'war against the Jews,' " reference was made to Western intelligence recruiting "anti-Nazi freedom fighters."

In fact, they were pro-Nazi fighters who opposed the Soviet Union.

True torches

No flame lasts forever. Inevitably, to preserve its light and force, its original spark must be passed on. So too with human beings. Indeed, so too especially with human beings.

Last week, barely hours apart, in one of those inscrutable, head-shaking coincidences that life occasionally places before us, the Jewish community in Canada and throughout the world lost two leaders who were torches casting a giant glow.

On Dec. 23, Jack Cummings of Montreal passed away at the age of 73. The very next day in Toronto, Phil Granovsky died at the age of 74. Both men were bastions of the community. Their achievements were legion. Such was the extent of their involvement in community affairs, the obituaries which appear elsewhere in this issue can sketch only a bare outline, in faint strokes, of the full, generous portrait of their lives. Each undertook numerous volunteer executive positions with local and national organizations. Each held positions of local and national leadership.

It would be no exaggeration to write that their labors over the past half century probably benefited the lives of every Jewish person in Montreal and Toronto in some direct or indirect way, as well as, in significant measure, the Jews of Canada, the people of Israel and the community at large. Their association with worthy causes was endless; their efforts were tireless and their willingness to step forward, to set the example, was inspirational.

Like true leaders, they saw with sharp, far-seeing vision; they perceived the world with unembellished realism; and they willingly accepted the grinding, day-to-day, detailed work of responsibility. Like true torches, they lit the way for others who followed, the next generation, touched, warmed and inspired by the flame of their love for their people and their commitment to a better world.

But the torches are now extinguished. In the midst of our melancholy, we pray the original spark of their flame has been preserved and passed on. As with their memories, the light and force of their unique flames will also be for blessing.

Hollow apology

For the third time in three years, according to the ombudsman of the Toronto Star, that newspaper has violated its own guidelines regarding religious advertising. The most recent incident occurred during Chanukah.

Jews for Jesus placed a full-page ad in the paper. It was clearly a proselytizing tract aimed at Jews. As such it was deeply offensive. But this particular advertisement went one step further. It invited the reader to self-identify into one of two categories: Jew or gentile. It was thus offensive and despicable.

The response from the community was swift and unequivocal. Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region and B'nai Brith immediately protested to the publisher, John Honderich. But his response was less than satisfactory.

He apologized for the paper's lapse in honoring its advertising guidelines and agreed that the portion requiring identification... was "offensive and in bad taste." But he did not condemn the principle or the purpose underlying the ad. He told The CJN that the ad "should not have run in this form." Honderich has clearly missed the point of our protest and misunderstood the essence of our pain. Any attempt to lure Jews away from being Jewish is an affront to the Jewish people. It should therefore be unacceptable to the paper to assist in that attempt and unjustifiable on any business grounds. To be fair, it must be pointed out that the Toronto Star was not alone in carrying the ad. It also appeared in the Toronto Sun four days earlier. The ad was equally offensive in that paper. But unlike the Star, the Sun has no guidelines which it trumpets as proof of its ethical and ethnic sensitivity. They admitted error in not clearly identifying the ad for what it was.

The real proof of the Star's sensitivity would have been to reject the ad outright. The seeming regularity with which the guidelines are violated, at least insofar as the Jews are concerned, leaves one to wonder about the Star's commitment to its guidelines. To us, those guidelines seem hollow, as does Honderich's apology.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

On Dec. 31, 1891, the Baron de Hirsch Institute was founded in Montreal. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Mr. Justice Hall fought for Soviet Jews

It is with great sadness that our committee of 700 lawyers and judges across Canada learned of the death of former Supreme Court of Canada justice Emmett Hall. He will deservedly be remembered in Canadian history for his outstanding contributions to the fields of medicare and education. He was a stalwart defender of human rights both in Canada and abroad.

In 1975, when our committee was formed, he graciously agreed to be our honorary chair and lent tremendous credibility to our efforts in fighting for the rights of Soviet Jewry. Hall was much more than a figure head and at the age of 80, undertook on our behalf an arduous trip to the former Soviet Union. He met with Soviet Refuseniks and attempted vainly to meet with Soviet government officials, judges and lawyers. When he returned, he appeared on national television and decried the Soviet Union's violation of its own and international agreements. Hall wrote critiques of the Soviet legal system and remained very active in our organization and took understandable pride when the Soviet Union crumbled and was succeeded by democratic governments. All Canadians are indebted to Hall for his remarkable achievements and leadership but none more than former Soviet Jews now living in freedom in Canada as a result of his tireless efforts on their behalf.

Our committee extends its deep sympathy to the family of Hall, a truly remarkable man, the likes of whom we will never see again.

Betel Centre not cut by 25 per cent

I am writing at the request of our board of directors to express our upset over a recent article titled "Metro community hit hard by budget cuts" (CJN Dec. 7).

In the article, I was quoted as saying: "A 25 per cent cut in services to Bernard Betel Centre is already being implemented and the agency faces another 25 per cent cut in funding next year." This is not correct and has caused distress in our community.

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has not been notified of any reduction in funding for 1996-97 from the province or from Metro. There has been the suggestion from Metro that it may reduce its community grants by at least 25 per cent. With respect to our centre, this would mean a reduction in our total revenues of approximately 2.3 per cent.

Bienvenue owes real apology

It is unbearable for this survivor of Nazi terror to accept the easy apology to the Jews given by Quebec Superior Court Judge Jean Bienvenue.

It took two hours of discussion behind closed doors to convince this arrogant man that there is reason to apologize to the rapidly dying out Holocaust survivors, and to Jews in general.

No word was heard from the judge about women, who were also insulted by him, nor of the damage to the fabric of this nation, when in the not-too-distant future, all kinds of Holocaust deniers, neo-Nazis and assorted rabble-rousers will start to quote the judge as the new prophet, like it or not, of the people.

The judge apologized, but where was his humility where the women of Quebec were concerned? He should issue a complete apology and make it real and sincere to the survivors and the women he insulted. His resignation will be welcome.

Learning French in Montreal

I moved to Montreal from Toronto in September to study Public Relations at McGill University, but because of the political uncertainty, I am torn as to what I will do when I graduate next year.

Since I am now living in Montreal, I decided not only that I would like to learn French again, but that it is imperative if I want to continue living here.

There are courses offered through continuing education at McGill, at $245 per semester, without credit. These courses are only offered at the beginner level on days that I am taking other classes. There is also a course at the University of Montreal, at $285, with credit. I received the application form for this course and it was in French only. When I called the university to request an English application, I was told that they would have to put in a special request for one.

A classmate of mine at McGill has just become a Canadian citizen. Through Immigration Canada she was able to take an intensive French course free, for a seven-week period. I was informed that since I am a Canadian citizen, I could not take this course.

It is hard for me to understand why some people feel that the French language and culture must be preserved by having a sovereign Quebec. It is quite clear to me that Quebec is very different from Toronto and the rest of Canada. Some sovereigntists also seem to think that English-speaking Canada has no interest in their language or culture. I am trying to learn the French language so that I can experience what it is really like to live in Montreal and experience the French culture.

It seems as though it is easier for someone from another country to be accepted in Quebec than it is for someone from another province in Canada.

Perspectives

From 'ordinary' man to beast and back again

(Karl Frenzel, an SS guard at Sobibor, was tried in the mid-sixties and convicted for his crimes. Fifty years after the Nuremburg trials, we must read and re-read reflections about evil's "ordinary" face.)

By DENA BLATT

We waited for him in the hotel lobby and at last he appeared. It was Karl Frenzel, all right, a former member of the SS. We were in Hagen, Germany; it was 1983 and Frenzel, while appealing his six consecutive life sentences after spending only 16 years in prison, was being accommodated in this moderately priced hotel. With me was Gotz Bockmann, a German reporter covering the war crimes trial. Frenzel greeted him, looked at me, smiled and said in German: "Is she the other journalist?"

"Yes," said Bockmann, "Her German is not the best. I will interpret. Herr Frenzel this is Frau Blatt."

Frenzel was stunned, then angry. So, I was the wife of a witness1 "Nein, nein," he muttered, and turned quickly to leave. I rushed after him. Long before I had married a survivor I had wanted to know, needed to know, where this evil came from — what made a man into a monster.

I caught up with him. Now I was face to face with the man accused of having personally murdered 40 people and had participated in the deaths of over 200,000. More personally, I was looking at the man who had brutally beaten my husband's father for stumbling on the "way to Heaven," and who played a crucial part in my husband's life minutes later by taking him out to be his "shoeshine boy."

I begged Frenzel to stay. I assured him I didn't want to talk about the death camp or the ongoing trial, only his childhood and family life. He smiled, came back and sat down.

He was in his early 70s, with the usual signs of advancing age — the double chin, a little bulge around the middle, hair grayish and receding. His face was a bit flushed, perhaps due to his fair skin. His eyes, quietly observing me, were soft and kind. He wore a neat dark suit with a white shirt and dotted tie — by itself a cold conservative look — but the colorful argyle wool vest over it gave him a touch of warmth and casualness. He was well-mannered, kind looking. Yes, I thought, he could be anyone's grandfather, holding a child lovingly on his lap, or a revered school teacher in front of respectful students. Yet this was the man who had killed men, women and children each day, and then had gone home and kissed his wife and young son.

Some of the accusations: he had given the cook 100 lashes for supposedly stealing food; anyone sick or slow he sent to the gas chambers; he had reported the escape plan of 72 Dutch Jews, then had led them to the gas chambers; he had had a youth shot for stealing a can of sardines; he had smashed a baby's head; and at the end, when the workers made a planned revolt, he had methodically shot down fleeing Jews.

I was anxious to hear his story. We were given a quiet room off the lobby and a hotel employee brought us cold drinks. As I fumbled with my tape recorder, I glanced at Frenzel. He was sitting calmly, sipping his beer, a slight smile on his face.

"I feel sorry for the witnesses," he said between sips, "the way they are pressured — made to prove everything, remember everything."

I nooded, then asked Frenzel why he had wanted to talk to a journalist.

"Perhaps it was to say I'm sorry," he went on, "but also to say you don't know what went on in us; you don't understand the circumstances we found ourselves in. For us it was also a very bad time."

I made no comment on his claim of personal suffering. "Tell me about your mother, father, sisters, brothers," I said. He seemed eager to talk. When it was over, I realized why.

He had had an ordinary childhood and youth in an ordinary middle class family, strongly religious. His brother had been studying for the priesthood. He sang in the church choir. He liked school. Math, history and religion were his favorites. He had friends, buddies, and played football. He even had a Jewish girlfriend but broke up. His father was a middle-of-the-road Social Democrat, who worked as a government clerk. His mother was a housewife. They were firm, but not too strict.

He eventually married, had five children, worked as a stage hand or prop man, and once managed a castle. He was a family man, proud of his family.

He was trying to tell me — and he succeeded — that he was like most people, an ordinary guy, a human being — which made it all the more horrible, all the more scary to think about. For as a human being, he made choices which ultimately led to Sobibor. The first of these was joining the Nazi Party in 1930 at the age of 19. What made him choose this route, I wondered. There were countless other ordinary men who took other paths.

"Tell me," I said, "why did you join the Nazi Party?"

He looked dumbfounded. "Because there was unemployment!" he exclaimed.

"Was there a conflict in you, being a Nazi and a Christian?" I asked. He looked bewildered. "Could you be a good Christian and be a Nazi too?"

He didn't seem to understand. "I was always a good Christian," he responded finally. "I was brought up in the Lutheran Church. I attended every Sunday with my wife and children. I'm still religious and so are my children."

He reached again for his beer, sipped and was quiet for a moment. "I worked at various jobs in Frankfurt. When a survivor recognized me years later and I was arrested, I was a projectionist in a theatre."

He paused, then continued: "I lived a simple life," he said. "I was a law-abiding man. I had to take care of my five children after my wife died."

Tears welled up as he held back a flood of emotions. He had returned to East Berlin, only to learn that his wife had been raped by Russians and later died of typhus. As he spoke, one could sense the mixture of rage and grief. He was not a robot. One could picture him showing love and tenderness at home. I wondered about his children, how much they knew. Of his three sons, one was a policeman, one a house painter, one a civil servant. Both daughters married master mechanics. I wanted to meet them. I needed to know more.

A week had passed. His children had refused interviews with me. Perhaps Frenzel could persuade them. With my interpreter, I dropped by unexpectedly, on the chance he'd be home.

The apartment building in a nice middle class suburb of Hanover was modern and well-kept, the landscaping neat and well-tended. I pressed the buzzer. The door opened and we entered the foyer. He could see us clearly from above.

"I wasn't expecting you," he said excitedly, "but come up."

He appeared upset as he ushered us into the living-room. "My children," he said, "called after the hotel interview. They said I shouldn't come to my grandchild's birthday. They don't want scandal. Not only that, my youngest son, just now hearing things for the first time, said that if he had known, he would not have shaken my hand." There was anguish in his voice.

"It was like being put on the stand by one's own son," he said, finally. "They don't understand it was my job."

I reminded him that one of his co-workers in Sobibor had asked for a transfer and had obtained it. He paid no attention to my remark.

He asked us to make ourselves comfortable. The home was unpretentious, but neat and tidy. Flourishing plants and knick-knacks in just the right places gave warmth and coziness to the simple modern furniture. We sat down on a couch in the living-room.

Suddenly a parakeet flew in and lighted on Bockmann's shoulder. Frenzel smiled. He loved his bird, his pet. With the cage never closed, it had free rein of the apartment. He coaxed it to him, but it flew off instead, then returned to Bockmann. Frenzel was clearly annoyed.

"Where's your wife?" I asked.

"She's not my wife," he answered softly. He wanted it clear that they were only living together but thinking of marriage, perhaps when the trial would be over.

She entered. She had been shopping. Despite the surprise visit, she greeted us with a gracious smile, hung up her coat and joined us. She was about 60, attractive, hair coiffed, nails polished, dressed in a simple beige form-fitting wool dress. It wasn't long before she revealed her feelings.

"It would be best if the Holocaust were forgotten," she said, placing an ashtray on the coffee table. "There should be no more trials. It does no one good to relive it." And in one breath, staring us down coldly: "Enough is enough. We too have suffered. It's the past and the past is over. We'd like to forget it."

Throughout this, Fenzel was quiet, impassive. She offered wine, tea, cookies. The talk moved to comparisons of Nazi colleagues. Franzel complained that other Nazis he had worked with or knew talked badly about him in court but didn't talk about their own crimes, and none had changed, none were repentant.

"I at least admit," he added, "that I am responsible for the deaths of 100,000. It's OK, you can put it in the American press."

"What do you say," I asked him, "when people say it never happened?"

"I say it's not right to say it never happened."

Appearing bored, Frau Frenzel turned to me as Frenzel took up conversation with Bockmann. "I mustn't forget my hairdresser's appointment," she said. "I'm going on vacation in the Canary Islands."

"For how long?," I asked.

"Three weeks, but he can't go with me," she said, resentment rising in her voice, " 'cause he has to attend the appeal." There was a pause. Then in an emotion-laden voice, "I worry so about him, all alone in the apartment ... sleeping restlessly, with no one to care for him." She wept softly.

I felt extremely uncomfortable and excused myself to "look at the bird" in the kitchen. I needed to collect myself.

Soon Frau Frenzel was beside me. Good, I thought. We could talk alone, woman to woman. I wondered how they had met six years earlier, while he was in prison. Was she a member of a Nazi support group? And how could a woman love a man she knows has personally murdered innocent men, women and children? Even a supposedly repentant one? Maybe she doesn't believe it! I made some inane remark about the bird, and then came right out with it.

"Tell me, do you yourself believe that Karl Frenzel did all those things they say he did?" I pictured her pondering this, then giving me a guarded reply full of rationalizations, but her answer came unhesitatingly.

"Yes, of course," she said. "It's in the trial transcipts. I believe it. But that was then. He's not that man now. He's kind and gentle. Why, he wouldn't hurt a fly!"

It left me dumbfounded. There it was. From ordinary man to beast and back again.

When we returned to the living room, I looked about and noticed the absence of books. There was only a cookbook and a conservative newspaper — nothing really to judge a person by. Seeing me eye the room, Frenzel offered to show me the bedroom, the one room I had not yet seen. I declined, but he insisted; so I went in. Was it to prove to me that it was only a bedroom, an ordinary bedroom, with bed, dresser and chair?

"Wait," said Frenzel, "you must see pictures of my grandchildren before you leave." Proudly he brought them out. And there they were, sweet adorable faces — the faces of all children.

We muttered Thank you and good-bye and left. My heart was heavy. Outside in the bright sunshine we joined the unconcerned — people going about their daily business, and I wondered ... "Who among them? Who in any crowd, anywhere?"

On Sept. 12, 1985, once more the verdict was given and recorded — life imprisonment. However, it was openly stated that for "health" reasons, he would live at home as a free man.

Opinions

Public opinion evenly split

The debate in the Israeli public is often reduced to an even split between the "50 per cent" who support "land for peace" and the "50 per cent" who do not believe in the trade. In this simplistic presentation, the left and right are two equal camps, a division which allows the Opposition of the day to challenge the government's legitimacy in making decisions.

By Shira Herzog

The reality, not surprisingly, is somewhat more complex. Underlying Israelis' positions on specific issues in the peace process, or even their decision on voting day, is a web of feelings and values about their country and its future that is not captured in the common discussion of the "split" in public opinion. Since 1967, most Israelis have known that they cannot have a democratic state, with a Jewish majority, that retains the West Bank (and Gaza) in its entirety.

The differences among Israelis are in the relative weight that they attach to several key values: a state with a Jewish majority; a state that is a democracy in which all citizens have equal rights; a state that incorporates the land captured in 1967 — the "Greater Land of Israel;" and a state at peace with its neighbors. Every Israeli recognizes that these cannot all be reconciled and that one or more of these must be compromised.

The Israeli daily, Yediot Aharonot, recently published the results of a seven-year tracking survey of Israelis' attitudes about these values, done by political scientists Michal and Yaacov Shamir. In September 1992, shortly after the last election, the Shamirs asked a random sample of Israelis if Israel can aspire to achieve all of these values. Only 17 per cent said Yes, while 80 per cent responded that this was impossible. In other words, Israelis know that it is difficult — if not impossible — to achieve a Jewish majority in an expanded land that contains the West Bank and Gaza (at the time both under Israeli occupation) and to establish in such an area a truly democratic government that will offer equal rights to all its residents, including the Arabs.

And in the Middle Eastern and international reality, it seems unlikely that peace can be achieved without either granting full citizenship rights to all or giving up some land. If these objectives are irreconcilable, then the critical question becomes what relative importance the public attaches to these different values, and what choices it is prepared to make among them.

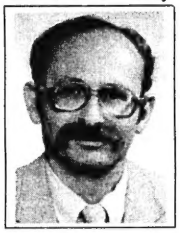
The results of 10 surveys conducted on these values since 1988 have been consistent. Two of the four values noted above emerge as significantly more important to a majority of Jewish Israelis. These are the value of Israel as a state with a Jewish majority, and the value of peace. These results include voters on the right and left of the spectrum. On the right, the values were ranked in the following order: a Jewish majority, peace, the Greater Land of Israel and democracy. Voters on the left of the spectrum, in contrast, ranked the values as follows: peace, a Jewish majority, democracy and the Greater Land. In other words, the common thread that binds Israelis when forced to weigh among these values is the desire to live in peace in a state with a Jewish majority. (In the last survey, immediately after Rabin's death, only one significant change was seen. More Israelis ranked democracy as important than in the past, due to the assault on democratic norms that they saw in the murder.)

These findings are instructive as the details of the Oslo accords are dissected and the legacy of Yitzhak Rabin is debated. As early as 1968, when he left the army after serving as chief-of-staff during the Six Day War, Rabin expressed his discomfort with Israel's occupation of another people and his belief in the value of a Jewish majority in a democratic Israel. What changed for Rabin were not his basic values, but his assessment of a changed regional and international reality that could allow Israel to pursue these values while retaining a position that he felt was strategically secure. In so doing, he felt that he was speaking to the values that are foremost in the hearts and minds of most Israelis.

According to the Shamirs' findings, only 10 per cent of Israelis surveyed at any time ranked the "land" value as first on their list. And only about 20 per cent of Israelis ranked democracy as first on their list. Therefore, the essential questions for Israelis, according to the Shamirs' findings, are not whether any given deal forces them to trade land for peace. Rather, they are whether any deal on the table furthers their desire to live in a state with a Jewish majority that is secure and at peace with its neighbors. The positions presented to voters by political parties are analyzed, consciously and subconsciously, against a political and cultural ethos that has these values at its core.

Baseball, CD-Roms & Jewish education

My 13-year-old son is a baseball fan and a student of the game, including its history. He reads all manner of books written by baseball experts, as well as the sports pages and baseball magazines. Yet for all his voracious reading, perhaps nothing has enhanced his love of the game more than two non-print sources: a CD-ROM version of the Baseball Encyclopedia, and the 18-hour Ken Burns PBS series on the history of baseball.



By Morton Weinfeld

The CD-ROM Baseball Encyclopedia has all the statistical information of the print text, but includes dozens of video and audio clips associated with key players. There is something magical about seeing and hearing the athletes in action. The same is true with the Burns video, which makes wonderful use of archival baseball footage.

What has this to do with Jewish education?

Many Jewish schools or school systems have yet to recognize fully the potential of both traditional audio-visual aids and newer technologies. (Of course the same is true for many mainstream schools.)

Last year, as a history project in his Jewish day school, my son wrote a major research paper dealing with Jewish life in Israel at the time of the rise of Christianity and under Roman rule. While he immersed himself in reading about that exciting period, one of the major sources he used, which also energized him, was the Abba Eban PBS series on Civilization and the Jews. At least two of the nine one-hour segments dealt with that Roman period. There is something about seeing film footage of Masada today, or archeological sites in and around Jerusalem, which makes the drama of the time come to life.

Over the past few years, a number of CD-ROMs dealing with Judaism have been produced or are under development. These are listed in a recent issue of Ten Da'at, a Jewish education journal. These CD-ROMs range from some aimed at teaching alephbet and basic Hebrew, to the massive computerized data bases produced by Bar-Ilan University's Responsa and Judaic Library. There are CD-ROMs dealing with the Holocaust, Jewish folklore and Jewish cooking. Judaic encyclopedias of various sorts are also available. The Internet also contains Judaica Web sites, as well as daily news reports from Israel and the Israeli press, in English.

Such learning tools are becoming popular more generally. McClelland and Stewart are releasing a CD-ROM version of the Canadian Encyclopedia, complete with video and audio clips of great Canadian figures and events.

We know from previous general research that computer assisted instruction can be of educational value. But there is very little scientific evidence on the impact of Jewish software. I have not evaluated the available CD-ROMs. Yet one can easily imagine that if they are done well and integrated into a coherent, rigorous program, they can enhance many aspects of a Judaic curriculum. Students would be able to relate to material in a way that would be more exciting, more immediate, than that available from text alone.

The cost of most of the CD-ROMs listed in the journal was under $100 (US). This makes them relatively affordable, assuming schools have the needed computers with CD-ROM capability. Jewish schools vary in the degree to which they have been willing and able to embrace this new technology. This is understandable. The technology is new, there are start-up costs involved and schools are usually too preoccupied with day-to-day issues to plan major innovations. Nevertheless more Jewish educators are finding the on ramp to the information superhighway.

But some caution is in order. Educators must be careful not to assume that the new technology will be an instant panacea, for all pedagogic problems. My son's love of baseball was not caused, only enhanced, by the CD-ROM. No one knows whether these new tools will ultimately lead to more positive Jewish outcomes. Moreover, many teachers would have to be made comfortable with them and ponder ways to introduce them into Judaic curricula.

More basic is the fact that all Judaic knowledge is ultimately rooted in text. The adoption of any new technologies must be seen as complementing but never substituting for the centrality of the text. The new technologies are learning tools which help students access more information more effectively. As in the case of video clips, they can stimulate interest and make learning more enjoyable. But they are a means to a greater end.

For Judaism, the medium is not the message. Jews are "people of the book" because of the message, whether on papyrus, in print or on computer screen.

Germany's first woman rabbi

The Week in Germany reports: Germany's 50,000-plus Jews are members of 71 congregations around the country. Although there are national organizations like the German Conference of Rabbis and the Central Committee of Jews in Germany, the congregations are autonomous and responsible for their own rabbinical appointments. That helps to explain a recent appointment that has provoked deep disagreement within the Jewish community. Earlier this year, the congregations of Oldenburg and Braunschweig (both Lower Saxony) offered a joint position to a newly ordained rabbi named Bea Wyler. Upon taking office on Aug. 1, she became the first woman rabbi to lead worship in Germany.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The Oldenburg and Braunschweig congregations are exceptions to the norm in Germany in that they are Conservative and not Orthodox. The majority of pre-war city congregations were Reform, and were re-established after 1945 by Orthodox Jews from Eastern Europe. The Oldenburg congregation was founded in 1992 and the majority of its members are women. In Braunschweig, too, women dominate and have taken over many of the tasks during worship traditionally reserved for men. The women convinced the men in the congregation that this would ensure their survival; since then, the congregation describes itself as "Conservative with gender equality." The appointment of a women rabbi was thus a logical step. "We reject any charges that we are abandoning Judaism. But if we aren't flexible, we'll lose the young people," said Renate Wagner-Redding, Braunschweig's congregation chair. The decision was accepted by Lower Saxony's State Association of Jewish Congregations, which provides part of the funding for Rabbi Wyler's salary.

The German Conference of Rabbis will be meeting this fall to consider the matter; its spokesperson, Rabbi Joel Berger, told the weekly Die Zeit that Rabbi Wyler would not be accepted as a member nor would her decisions in matters of religious law be recognized. The Central Committee of Jews in Germany, according to chair Ignatz Bubis, would not take a stand on the issue. Speaking on his own behalf, though, Bubis similarly predicted that the new rabbi would not be recognized by her colleagues, adding that he himself could not participate in religious services conducted by a woman.

Rabbi Wyler, 44, was born in Switzerland, where her family has lived for nearly three centuries. An agronomist by training, she worked in a variety of jobs before deciding to pursue rabbinical study five years ago and this past May, she was ordained in New York by the Jewish Theological Seminary. She is optimistic that the furor her appointment has spurred will gradually give way. "Step by step," she told Die Zeit, "practical solutions" to the problem arising from the differences among the various Jewish traditions are certain to be found.

Rabbi Wyler is the first woman rabbi to lead a congregation in Germany, but she is not the first ordained woman to work there. In 1935, Regina Jonas was ordained a rabbi, possibly the first ever. She received an appointment in Berlin, not as a rabbi but as a teacher, and was deported to Auschwitz in 1944.

The Kirshner File

The Russian poem that caused a sensation

By Sheldon Kirshner

Yevgeny Yevtushenko, arguably Russia's greatest living poet and literary idol, slouched in a chair, his body relaxed, his long legs stretched out langorously.

Rays of pale morning sunlight filtered through his thinning gray hair and highlighted his luminous blue eyes.

He wore a loose-fitting colored shirt, the tails hanging out of his blue pants, and black loafers. He was clearly in a relaxed mood, but his rolling, heavily-accented Slavic voice was tinged with heartfelt emotion.

"This poem, " he mused, "gave me an understanding of how one poem can have such an impact on society. I am very proud of it."

Yevtushenko, of course, was referring to Babi Yar, described by the Encyclopedia Judaica as "the most famous single poem of the Holocaust." First published in 1961, and subsequently reprinted in 72 languages, Babi Yar triggered a sensation in the Soviet Union.

Named after a ravine in Kiev where some 30,000 people, mainly Jews, were murdered by the Nazis in 1941, Babi Yar turned on Yevtuskenko's outcry that no official monument had ever been erected to commemorate this baneful event. In a nation where monuments were as common as mushrooms after a rain, it seemed incongruous and unjust that one had not been commissioned in honor of the hapless victims of Babi Yar.

"I was shocked," recalled Yevtushekno, who was in Toronto recently as a guest of the International Festival of Authors. "I was indignant."

One of the guiding lights of the liberal intelligentsia during much of the post-Stalinist period, Yevtushenko was apprised of the massacre in Babi Yar by Anatoly Kuznetzov, an obscure writer whom he met in 1960.

Shaken and angered by Soviet officialdom's blithe rejection of Babi Yar as an event worthy of remembrance, Yevtushenko was inspired to write the 99-line poem, which created a political storm in the bastion of Communism.

To conservative ideologues, Babi Yar was anathema because it challenged two pillars of Soviet dogma. It implied that anti-Semitism, formally outlawed, still existed in the Soviet Union. It unmasked the hypocrisy that Jews had been killed as "Soviet citizens" during the destructive German occupation, when in fact they had been marked for death as Jews.

Immediately after visiting Babi Yar in the company of Kuznetzov, Yevtushenko composed his now-famous poem, and he read it before a vast audience in a concert hall in Kiev, the capital of the Ukrainian region.

"The first reaction was dead silence," he said, suddenly alighting from his seat to pace the floor of the hotel room with a panoramic view of Lake Ontario. "Then, an avalanche of applause."

But his strongest memory is that of the sight of a wizened old woman who climbed to the stage and kissed his hand in a flourish of appreciation. "And she was not Jewish, believe me."

The response was similar in Moscow, and encouraged by the feedback, Yevtushenko submitted Babi Yar to the open-minded editor of Literaturnaya Gazeta, probably the leading Soviet journal of its kind.

Yevtushenko has not forgotten the editor's misgivings. "He recognized that the publication of Babi Yar would cause a scandal. He also thought he would be fired."

As it happened, he was entirely correct. Babi Yar ignited a fierce controversy, not only within the Communist party and the state-controlled media, but at the very apex of the Soviet leadership. "Comrade Yevtushenko, that poem has no place here," party secretary Nikita Khrushchev is reported to have told him.

"I was accused of being anti-patriotic, of forgetting my own people," said Yevtushenko, a smile creasing his pallid face. "Some even said that my poem provoked anti-Semitism!"

Critics took him to task for passing over the murder of ethnic Russians and Ukrainianss in Babi Yar and for insinuating that anti-Semitism was alive and well in the Soviet Union.

Defending himself, Yevtushenko explained that Babi Yar was more complex than it appeared. "My poem was not only about Babi Yar," he observed. "It was a denunciation of global anti-Semitism."

Amid the uproar, Yevtushenko was deluged by 10,000 letters, mainly from fans who praised Babi Yar. "But some of the letters were very dirty and libelous."

One irate vandal scratched the epithet "Zhid" on his car. In a calculated show of bravado, Yevtushenko left the curse word on the car, driving around Moscow until the police stopped him and painted it over at their expense.

But the worst was yet to come. The city of Kiev, sensitive to charges that Ukrainians had collaborated with the Nazis, banned Yevtushenko from municipal concert halls. The ban was not lifted until 1985. (Ukrainians seemed particularly miffed by Babi Yar. In 1972, while he recited it in St. Paul, Minn., anti-Soviet Ukrainian nationalists pounced on him, breaking two ribs.)

Eventually, the Soviet authorities sanctioned the publication of Babi Yar in book form, albeit in a modified version. Under pressure, Yevtushenko added four new lines concerning the martyrdom of Russians and Ukrainians at Babi Yar. He yielded so that Dmitri Shostakovich — the composer and conductor — could proceed with presenting the 13th Symphony, which was based on Babi Yar. Shostakovich had been profoundly touched by it, said Yevtushenko.

He rejects charges that the additional stanzas compromised the integrity of Babi Yar. "I was not happy to make these changes," he allowed. "But they do not tamper with the spirit of the poem. I did it so that the 13th Symphony could be performed."

Khrushchev, nevertheless, was perturbed by the 13th Symphony, complaining that the Central Committee of the Communist party had been overwhelmed by letters critical of Babi Yar.

Yevtushenko remains respectful of Khrushchev, his attitude to Babi Yar notwithstanding. "He was a man who exposed Stalin's crimes and liberated many political prisoners." And, he claimed, he was not an anti-Semite. "No, no, I don't think so."

Due to the popularity and notoriety of Babi Yar, Yevtushenko was branded as a "hidden Jew" by racists, a label he greets with amusement. "I don't have one drop of Jewish blood," he said. But Yevtushenko, who is of Polish, Ukrainian and Russian origin, emphasizes that he was raised in a tolerant atmosphere which valued multiculturalism and internationalism.

Born in Siberia in 1933, Yevtushenko established his reputation as a dissident in the aftermath of Stalin's death in 1953. Branded an "individualist," he was expelled from the Young Communist League and thrown out of the Writer's Institute. Later, he protested the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, and together with Andrei Sakharov, called for a kinder, gentler Communism. But Yevtushenko was always a member in good standing of the elite, which is perhaps why some critics sneered that he was really a pseudo-liberal and, as Life magazine sardonically put it in 1967, "the Soviet Union's best-established anti-Establishment poet."

No one, however, is contemptuous of his remarkable body of work, which includes 42 books of poetry and three novels, the latest of which is Don't Die Before You're Dead.

And neither is anyone skeptical of his principled opposition to anti-Semitism, which he has lambasted repeatedly throughout the years.

Yevtushenko, who has visited Israel three times and plans a fourth visit in January, considers it tragic that Russian Jews are emigrating.

"It will be a big tragedy for us if they all leave. Jews are very important to us. I could not imagine Russia without Jews. They're indispensable."

Israeli museum's catalogues are of the highest calibre

Last year, I had the pleasure once again of visiting Beth Hatefutsoth, the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in the garden-like setting of Tel Aviv University.

I found the exhibits unfailingly creative and fascinating. The museum, I believe, should be on the itinerary of tourists who wish to immerse themselves in a total Jewish/Israeli experience. Beth Hatefutsoth imparts enormous insights into the vast panoply of Jewish history and, I might add, of the raison d'etre of Israel's existence.

As I was leaving, I paused at the gift shop, fastening my eyes upon a set of handsome coffee-table books on sale.

They were the official catalogues of past exhibitions. Flipping through the pages of several, I was increasingly impressed by the erudite essays and the artfully rendered illustrations. These were not mere, hastily-assembled program notes, if you will. They were bright, professionally-bound volumes of the highest order that any library worth its salt would welcome.

Thanks to the generosity of Joel Cahen, one of the museum's curators, I took a few sampler catalogues back home.

Odyssey of the Exiles: The Sephardi Jews 1492-1992, with an introduction by Yitzhak Navon, the former president of Israel, is a superb piece of work. Consisting of learned articles by such reputable historians as Haim Beinart, Yosef Kaplan and Joseph Hacker, and of beautifully reproduced paintings, woodcuts, photographs and maps from the period in question, it is a wonder to behold.

In the Land of the Golden Fleece: The Jews of Georgia, History and Culture was not, as some may have flippantly guessed, about that southern American state with an identical name. No, this volume dwelled on the other Georgia, the Georgia of the Caucasus, which declared its independence after the tottering Soviet Union finally collapsed under its own weight in 1991.

My knowledge of Georgia's venerable Jewish community and of its ancient customs had been scant. But after delving into an illuminating series of thoroughly researched articles by David Lang, Gershon Ben-Oren, Yitzhak David, Rachel Arbel, Lily Magal and Lily Baazova, I was no longer ignorant.

Workers and Revolutionaries: The Jewish Labor Movement guided me in a completely different direction. As I steeped myself in the intricacies of the topic, surfing from the shtetls of Eastern Europe to the tenements of the Lower East Side in Manhattan, I remembered S. Frug's Eulogy to Labor:

"Let us sing praises to toil and to labor/ Let us salute them with love and pride/ Strength to the hand which is horny and calloused/ Strength to the brow which with sweat is bedewed."

Beyond the Sambatyon: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes propelled me into a mist-shrouded subject — the fate, such as it was or might have been, of the Israelite tribes who were detached from the body of Judaism seemingly eons ago.

Where are they now? Are they still Jews? Do they practise Judaic rites? Not all my questions were answered. But it had been quite a journey of the mind.

SILVERBERG, MORRIS JOEL ז"ל

With everlasting courage and dignity, Morris Joel Silverberg passed away on Thursday, December 14th, 1995. He is sorely mourned and missed by his wife, Ada, his daughter and son-in-law, Ronna and Roy Birnboim, his precious grandchildren, Deborah and Jason, and his sister, Marion Silverman. Also mourning his loss are his sister-in-law and brother-in-law Anne and Leo Shulman, his sister-in-law Sarah Nagler, and his numerous nieces and nephews. He was predeceased by his parents Aaron and Rachel, his brother and sister-in-law Abraham and Sarah, his brother and sister-in-law Jack and Sally, his sister and brother-in-law Betty and Willie Lidowitz of New York City, and his brother-in-law Ben Silverman.

As a young child, he immigrated to Winnipeg with his family, where he spent his childhood, youth and married life until 1986 when he and his wife moved to Toronto to be near his beloved daughter, son-in-law and grandchildren.

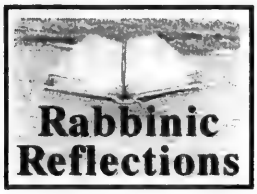
Morris Joel Silverberg was a man who thrived on hard work and commitment to the values of Judaism. He became a successful businessman as a partner in Acme Chrome Furniture Company, was past president of Rosh Pina Synagogue, a devout Zionist and supporter of the State of Israel. The love of his family was paramount.

A true man of integrity, he should be described as living by the golden rule of "derech eretz".

The funeral took place in Toronto on Sunday, December 17th at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Interment was at Pardes Shalom Cemetery. The pallbearers were: his grandson, Jason Birnboim, nephews Merrill Shulman, William Silverberg and Norman Silverberg, Dr. John Nkansah, Dr. Chaim Birnboim, Dr. Meyer Birnboim and Dr. Rodney Slonim. Honourary pallbearers were Max Birnboim, B.G. Gladstone, and Arly Shaban.

As an expression of sympathy, donations may be made to the Jewish National Fund or charity of your choice.

May his beautiful deeds be recognized by G-d Almighty.



Powerful contrasts

By RABBI LAWRENCE M. PINSKER

Some people say that our truest and deepest values are revealed only to our attorneys. A look at the wills people compose reveal their loves and hatreds, achievements, and awareness of how others have affected their lives.

The Torah reading for this Shabbat, Vayechi, and its related Haftorah offer us a powerful contrast between Jacob's blessing of his sons in Genesis and King David's last testament to his son Solomon. King David urges Solomon to follow G-d's ways, but ends on a bitter note of court intrigue, politics and revenge. He seems to caution Solomon that no blessing is sufficient unless one fulfils the commitment to the Divine Mandate — in this instance, to not let a murderer go unpunished even years after the crimes. David sees Solomon as enacting Davidic policies in a time after his death.

Jacob's testament, on the other hand, does not deal with politics in the present, nor with past grudges, but rather with defining a future beyond the lives of his children and grandchildren. It does not dwell on the moment except insofar as the moment contains the visible seeds of eternity; it does not rest on the management and disposition of property, but rather on the transmission of an intangible heritage.

Both the patriarch Jacob and King David bestow a blessing upon their descendants, but there is an irony to the text; the blessings reveal the limits of these two men. All through the book of Genesis, whenever one generation blesses another, people can give to others only that which they have been given.

Jacob cannot bless his children with something he does not have within himself; nor can King David. Whatever they lack, they cannot leave as an inheritance for their sons, since they never modeled that behavior. If either lacks compassion or sensitivity, it is unlikely that his children will be blessed by it, never having seen it in action. This is the hidden meaning of the word brachah (blessing): it doesn't refer to an abstract concept, but rather to embodied action.

In the contrast between Jacob's blessing and David's, we see that the idea of a blessing is not quite what we had expected. It is a statement of one's deepest hopes and beliefs. In a perceptive note, one commentator tells us that the ancient Israelites saw human beings as being saturated with power to affect their own growth and to affect the well-being of the world around them.

This vital power, without which no living being can exist, "is not simply an internal state of the soul, but also the way the power affects others and the world around each individual. What is possible within the scope of an individual's brachah is what comes to be. Therefore, the blessing means at the same time something internal and something external. It is our internal strength and at the same time the happiness and fullness in life that we create."

Seen from this perspective, brachah bridges the realms of human and Divine, connecting the gifts we receive from G-d to our need to live with gratitude by doing good with our health, strength, compassion and talents. Blessings may vary according to differences between individuals and may be of different sorts — as Jacob notes in the words addressed to his children — but we are alike in our obligation to turn these gifts to make a difference for the good in the world.

As the commentator notes: "There are people who succeed in everything they undertake, others who fail in everything. There is so far nothing strange in this. But for the ... Israelites this was not a matter of chance. It depended upon the blessing of the (person) — upon some gift or capability of the person ... — and matching the circumstances in which one finds oneself."

The blessing — what you do with what you've got — has an impact on everything and everyone that surrounds it. The poet Ruth Brin expresses this beautifully when she writes: "Living we must bless our children, placing our hands upon them and turning their faces toward G-d; living, we must struggle for a better way." It is the wise parent who can show his or her children the individuality of each child's ability to address G-d and bless the world, whatever our talents.

A story is told about Michaelangelo, who was hauling a huge block of marble through the marketplace in an Italian town. Onlookers mocked him because the marble was ugly and misshapen.

"What do you expect to do with this ugly rock," they taunted him.

He replied, "Inside this rock there is an angel trying to get out," and went on to sculpt what he perceived within the stone.

Inside all of us are blessings we have yet to manifest. Recognizing this potential, this blessing — so that we can begin to live it more fully — is the beginning. Whoever aids us in our efforts to "let the angel fly free" is a part of our blessing, and living the mandate of their own as well.

Abraham's Understanding

I, Abraham, forged a path from Ur, guided by God. And day by day, shaping the future was my constant thought.
I was no architect constructing ziggurats, as men in Ur. No scribe of cuneiform.
I sought to be a spiritual guide, no less!
I was so proud! My son so headstrong!
I knew what to do, better than he,
and so my stubborn son and I butted our heads each day, while he grew stronger, and while I,
sensing the ache within my joints,
knew that my own strength waned.

Sarah, far wiser then than I, warned me of danger in my path,
but I argued with Isaac daily to make him see the folly of his ideas.

I heard God call to me to sacrifice,
I was to take my son, my Isaac,
and deliver him for death.
Though I seemed then to bow to the command of God, in fact
I was prepared to carry out His will, for it was mine. I wished to sacrifice my son, so long as he opposed me!
I would have killed him gladly.
I would have killed him then,
had not a ram appeared.
A sign from God, I took it, that I should desist.

My son is headstrong still. And I?
I've learned I cannot shape the future as I will.
That task is Isaac's now, not mine.

Ethiopian Jew enters rabbinate

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many young Ethiopian Jews in Israel are leaving Judaism, says rabbinic student Yafet Alamu, who will be the first Ethiopian Jew to be ordained by the Conservative movement.

"Our spiritual leaders were not accepted in Israel and we were insulted," said Alamu, who was here recently for a four city lecture tour in Canada and the United States with Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, formerly of Toronto, who made aliyah in 1989.

Alamu participated in the services at Adath Sholom Synagogue, where Rabbi Meirovich conducts the yomim tovim services, and was the guest speaker at a Tribute to Jerusalem 3000 program at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

"I thank all the Jewish people who brought us to Israel and gave us freedom. But on our arrival, we began to loose our identity and direction as a result of the official attitude of the religious establishment," he told The CJN.

Although 95 per cent of the 60,000 Jews who lived in Ethiopia were religious, Alamu explained that the spiritual leaders in Ethiopia, called kessim, are not considered by the Israeli establishment as rabbis.

"Today, there is a struggle to keep the young people from leaving Judaism and that's why I entered the rabbinate," he said.

Alamu is a community leader and president of the Southern Wing of Zion, a group of Ethiopian Jews working to bring to Israel the remaining 14,000 Ethiopian Jews, whose status was considered by some to be questionable.

"Through the efforts of the Southern Wing of Zion, the rabbis in Israel have now declared that these Ethiopians are Jewish people," he said.

When he completes his studies at the Seminary of Jewish Studies, he said, he will try to bring the Ethiopians back to their roots.

At the seminary, he said, they do not deny any point of view — they integrate tradition and modernity.

He is pleased that there are Ethiopian rabbis ordained in the Orthodox tradition, "but I don't think they will have influence," he said. "They are moulded in the Orthodox perception; therefore, I doubt if they can reach the broad spectrum of Ethiopian Jews."

Rabbi Meirovich, who is affiliated with the seminary, said that along with graduate programs in rabbinic ordination, education and Jewish studies, and preparation of Russian and Ethiopian immigrants for leadership roles, the seminary teaches the values of Masorti (Conservative) Judaism and supports the TALI program which provides Jewish studies programs within Israel's secular public school — it insures the integration of Judaism, Zionism and modernity.

Married with four children, Alamu, who works part time as a graduate nurse at Hadassah Hospital, was born in a small village near the northern city of Gondar in Ethiopia in 1959. He described his escape to Sudan from Ethiopia as "long, arduous and dangerous."

He said he thanked film-maker Simcha Jacobovici, Prof. Irwin Cotler and all the Jews who helped his people leave Ethiopia. "I ask all the Jewish people to come help us solve the problems we face.

"And I call on the Canadian Association for Ethiopian Jews, who have acted in the past to bring us home, to act in support of education."

Author probes Speer's psyche

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Albert Speer: His Battle With Truth by Gitta Sereny, Random House $45.00

This revealing book, a 12-year quest by the author to pierce the facade of half-truths, deceit and evasions erected by Hitler's favorite architect and minister of Armaments and War Production, is a massive and continually absorbing study. It throws light on an enigmatic and paradoxical personality and at the same time on the many-sided history of Nazi Germany.

At the Nuremberg Trials, Albert Speer received a 20-year sentence for his war crimes. But his conscience gave him no rest and he was tormented with guilt and remorse for his part in atrocities against Jews and others. With unusual honesty he confronted his unspeakable behavior — even as he steadfastly denied actual knowledge of Hitler's "final solution" or awareness of the horrendous mistreatment of slave laborers under his control. A Faustian pact had been made with the devil and Speer could not acknowledge his part in the bargain.

The author, one of Europe's foremost journalists, who has a special interest in the Third Reich, has written an engrossing study of a benighted regime and a psychological portrait of one of its prime movers whose affection for Hitler was unbounded and at one point in his career admitted, "All I wanted was for this great man to dominate the globe."

At the book's end the author records Speer's admission, at an unguarded moment, in a letter written in 1977. "It is not individual acts or omissions, however grave, which weigh upon me, but my conduct as part of the leadership. This is why I accepted an overall responsibility in the Nuremberg trial and reaffirm this now. However, to this day I still consider my main guilt to be my tacit acceptance of the persecution and the murder of millions of Jews."

The author concludes, "If Speer had said as much in Nuremberg, he would have been hanged."

The Statement by Brian Moore Knopf Canada $29.95

Who murdered Pierre Brossard? Was it the Committee for Justice for the Jewish Victims of Dombey? Did this group place the statement on the dead man's chest accusing him of crimes against humanity and exulting that after 44 years of delay the slain Jews had been avenged?

Perhaps, on the other hand, the killer or killers were friends or relatives of French resistance fighters whom Brossard, as former chief of the Second Section of the Marseille region of the Milice, had betrayed to the Nazis.

Or maybe Brossard's death was deemed necessary by the Catholic Church, in order to silence an erstwhile friend who knew too much. Over four decades they had protected him from harm, hidden and sustained him and rationalized their behavior.

As the hunted man seeks refuge in the monasteries and abbeys of southern France, he becomes increasingly aware of his relentless stalkers. Twice he lashes out to kill. Ingeniously he eludes his pursuers. Death finally comes as a surprise: "Uneasy, he went into the dark. And in that moment saw Pochon raise both hands, saw the gun, a moment before the first bullet hit him in the chest. The second bullet hit while he was on his knees ... Pochon took a flashlight from his pocket and shined it on the dead face. He then put on a pair of surgical gloves. There must be no fingerprints on the statement. He crouched down and, carefully, using two large safety pins, pinned the statement to the dead man's chest."

Moore, 74, was born in Belfast, lives in California and retains his Canadian citizenship. In a recent Toronto interview he revealed that the protagonist of The Statement is based on several personalities of recent French history, especially Paul Tovier.

Why did the Catholic clergy hide so many war criminals? Moore answers, "The reasons ranged from arrogance about the primacy of church law over civil law, to charity, to anti-Semitism, to self-protection. The Church was very pro-Petain [Vichy government leader Marshal Philippe Petain], and a great deal more might be exposed by having Touvier tried than they wanted."

The Statement holds the reader through sheer narrative drive and power, the subtle delineation of character and unswerving intelligence. The Statement is a quick read but it persists tenaciously in memory.

Likud would continue peace process, shaliach predicts

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — No matter who wins the 1996 election in Israel, the peace process will continue, says Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs, the newly-appointed Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach in British Columbia.

Speaking at a JNF meeting in Victoria at the Jewish Community Centre, Fuchs, who used to work closely with Yitzhak Rabin at Israeli military headquarters, said that unless Israel wants to live in a constant state of battle with the Arab world, an overall peace agreement is essential.

He noted that Jordan made peace with Israel as soon as the peace negotiations started a year ago. He reported that Israel now has diplomatic relations with 160 countries — double the number before Rabin and Arafat shook hands in Washington.

Even if the Likud wins the election, the peace process will carry on, he said. Further, Fuchs predicted, at least 50 per cent of the settlers in the West Bank will move into Israel if they receive proper financial remuneration.

Fuchs said dissenting Israelis will have to learn to get along with each other. "Israelis," he said, "can't debate. They shout at each other." But now, he added, they at least are talking and beginning to listen and there is general agreement the government can't continue to spend 25 per cent of its budget on the army. Nor should young people between 18 and 21 years have to give three years of their lives to the armed forces, he said.

Of those who don't approve of the peace negotiations, nobody yet has come up with a satisfactory suggestion about solving the Jewish-Arab situation, he maintained.

Replying to a question from the floor, Fuchs said Rabin promised to negotiate with Syria about the Golan and he was certain Peres would carry out the promise.

Speaking for himself as a military man, Fuchs said control of the Golan is no longer a military essential and if negotiations with Syria begin, they will go quickly and smoothly, just as did the negotiations on the Sinai between Menachem Begin and Anwar al-Sadat.

As for Jerusalem, Fuchs said he expects "tremendous U.S. pressure" to make some sort of arrangement with the Palestinians.

Fuchs announced a JNF "megatour" from Vancouver to Israel, May 7 to 20. The cost is $3,245 (plus taxes) plus four trees at $36. The tour will include three nights at the Tel Aviv Hilton, one night in the Moriah Tiberias and six nights at the Hyatt Regency in Jerusalem. A dinner with the mayor of Jerusalem is scheduled.

Poster campaign adopted

KELOWNA, B.C. — A Program Against Racism poster campaign has been adopted by the Rutland Senior Secondary School here, in an effort to discourage the spread of racism, reports lawyer Robert Levin, an official of the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC).

Levin met recently with the school's principal to discuss other projects to combat racism. He said Rutland was singled out by the OJC because it's a school that has been targeted for recruitment by Charles Scott, Canadian leader of the Aryan Nations, and by other white supremacist, anti-Semitic groups.

At a Remembrance Day ceremony, students presented several mini-dramas portraying the suffering of various people, including Jews, during World War II.

כל ישראלי ויהודי גאה באיזשהוא מקום ב"חוק השבות", אותו חוק שמאפשר לכל בן אדם שמוכיח את יהדותו לקבל אזרחות ישראלית. בשנים האחרונות, כשאתיופים רבים התחילו לטעון שהם יהודים מומרים, החלו ויכוחים גדולים בישראל לגבי הצדק והמצאותיות בחוק הזה. לאחרונה יצא לי לקבל פרספקטיבה מפתיעה על כמה שישראל מיוחדת ומקורית בגישה שלה לחוק השבות, וזה קרה לי דווקא מזווית בלתי צפויה. או ככה: ביקר אותי פרופסור הונגרי, חבר טוב, שהגיע לסיבוב הרצאות בצפון אמריקה. שוחחנו על מה שקורה ביוגוסלביה, והוא סיפר לי שבסרביה יש מיעוט הונגרי גדול. עקב המצב הקשה ביוגוסלביה והגיוס של צעירים סרבים להילחם באחיהם לשעבר בבוסניה וקרואטיה, התחילה תנועת פליטים הונגרים מסרביה לתוך הונגריה השכנה. מה אתם חושבים - נתנו להם אזרחות הונגרית? איפה! לא דובים ולא יער: אלה הם הונגרים שווכים ליחס של פליטים בהונגריה עצמה! תשוו זאת לאתיופי שלא היה לו כל קשר עם היהדות במשך אלפי שנים, שאינו יודע מילה בעברית ושאין לו שום קשר עם תרבות יהודית, ישראלית, ממש כלום! הוא מגיע לישראל, מקבל אזרחות, שיכון, אולפן ומה לא! מה אני אגיד לכם - וזהי אולי תמצית ההבדל בין ישראל לשאר העולם. "כל ישראל ערבים זה לזה" בהחלט מעורר גאווה.

במפעל הסתדרותי גדול התחיל גל של גניבות, והציבו שומר בפתח שיבדוק מה מוציאים משם. בעיקר היה חשוד בעיני השומר פועל אחד שהיה יוצא כל יום מן השער עם מריצה מלאה פסולת בניין וסמרטוטים, אבל כל החיפושים לא העלו דבר. חלפו שנים והשומר שיצא לפנסיה פוגש בבית הזקנים את הפועל ההוא ושואל אותו : " תגיד, עכשיו כשהכל כבר היסטוריה, מה גנבת כל יום דרך השער שלא הצלחתי למצוא?" ענה לו הפועל: "מריצות, סחבתי דרך השער המון מריצות".

Israel's 'silent majority' said to be lining up for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yitzhak Rabin's assassination has galvanized moderate Israelis — Israel's "silent majority" — to line up more vocally behind the Middle East peace process, according to the founder and political director of Americans for Peace Now.

But what remains to be seen is whether their shock and outrage at the killing can be institutionalized for political gain in Israel's 1996 election, said Mark Rosenblum in an interview.

"We want to make them permanent players in the political process," said Rosenblum, who was here to deliver a speech at Holy Blossom Temple sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

Yet another fallout of Rabin's murder is that the political consciousness of Israel's youth, commonly dismissed as the "MTV generation," has been raised.

"Kids of voting age by the hundreds have converged on Peace Now offices in Jerusalem," said Rosenblum, who is based in Manhattan. Peace Now's task is to keep them in the peace camp.

Peace Now, he disclosed, has launched a massive campaign "to win over youth in Israel. We're opening scores of new chapters all over Israel. We're circulating petitions. We're printing thousands of bumper stickers. We're painting the street with peace."

Turning to a related topic, Rosenblum urged the right-wing opposition "to disassociate" itself from ultra-nationalists, who, he observed, have a history of trying to solve problems through violence.

He said that "the nationalist credentials" of the Likud party have been tarnished because of its ideological affinity with the Greater Israel views of Yigal Amir, Rabin's assassin.

Rosenblum believes that the Labor party can probably capitalize on the assassination if four factors work in its favor.

Will David Levy, the former foreign minister who bolted from Likud to form his own party, throw his weight behind Prime Minister Shimon Peres?

Will Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet aliyah activist who has announced the formation of a Russian political movement, act likewise?

Will the voting turnout of Israeli Arabs, who form nearly one-fifth of the population, be as high as that of Jews?

Will new voters — the country's youth — rally behind Peres?

Labor's fate at the polls is also dependent on the PLO's ability to contain, deter and punish terrorists attempting to wreck the peace process, he noted.

Rosenblum called on the Israeli government to be more vigilant in disbursing funds to religious seminaries. Some yeshivot, he claimed, are "hotbeds of extremism."

As well, he said, the American government should launch a serious investigation of Jewish charitable organizations in the United States which channel money to settlers in the territories.

Rosenblum, who visited Damascus last January to confer with Syrian officials, said that Peres wants to reopen stalled negotiations with Syria.

Rather than concentrate on security arrangements as did Rabin, Peres will probably seek to hammer out a package deal with Syria.

Negotiations with Syria are likelier to succeed, he said, if the Syrians make four major concessions: allow early warning stations on their territory; accept an Israeli withdrawal to the old international line rather than the June 1967 boundary; accept a longer withdrawal timetable; and tighten the link between an Israeli pull-out and a normalization of relations with Israel.

Rosenblum is not certain whether Syria will ever agree to such conditions. In making his calculations, President Hafez al-Assad, a member of the Alawite minority, must take domestic factors into consideration.

Free loans society seeking to expand its membership

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An outreach program to enlist more Canadian cities in the Association of Hebrew Free Loans of North America will be undertaken by Shirley Barnett of Vancouver, who was elected vice-president at the organization's recent 14th annual convention held here.

Barnett is one of the founders of the revitalized Vancouver Hebrew Assistance Association (HAA), which marked its 15th anniversary and the 80th anniversary of the original organizations which provided free loans in Vancouver.

Irving Levine of Pittsburgh was re-elected president of the North American association (AHFL). In recognition of the membership from Australia and Israel, the convention decided to change the name to the International Association of Hebrew Free Loans.

Barnett's task will be to recruit not only Canadian cities but to expand membership worldwide. She is currently dealing with a request for membership from Prague, she reported.

It was agreed that the organization's work will include helping provide disaster relief in cities hit by hurricanes, floods, earthquakes and other natural disasters.

"Having a worldwide association to respond to such situations will be a great aid to people affected who need loan aid to get re-established," the delegates stated in a resolution.

Barnett said that in Canada she will concentrate on Montreal, Ottawa and Winnipeg. Victoria was represented at the parley for the first time.

She said 15 cities, including Melbourne, were represented at the convention attended by about 65 delegates. The cities have loaned out over $25 million, she said.

Barnett said 30 or so member-cities didn't send delegates but noted that "the free loan world" has money available to provide help. Member-organizations have loans outstanding totalling over $40 million.

Matas' book hits too close to home

Shul rescinds invitation to speak

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Award-winning Winnipeg author, Carol Matas, views the issue as one of censorship.

Denise Waldman, president of the Shaarey Zedek sisterhood, says it is a "small issue blown out of proportion."

"This is a case of libel chill," says Matas.

In early September, she explains, she was invited to address an annual Interfaith Luncheon scheduled for the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest congregation, in January. "I considered it an honor to be asked," she says.

In mid-November, she received a call from Waldman telling her her invitation was being rescinded.

"Her [Waldman's] reasons were vague," Matas recalls. "She said something about a mix-up and implied that someone else had already been invited."

Matas let the matter rest for two or three weeks. Then she phoned Sam Wilder, the president of the synagogue. He knew nothing about the matter but promised to look into it. He called back to say that legal advice had been sought and the sisterhood had been told that if she spoke at the luncheon, the synagogue could be sued because of her latest novel.

(Matas' newest book, The Primrose Path, is a fictional account of an Orthodox rabbi and principal of a school who is charged with molesting children in his care.)

"I appreciate that he [Wilder] told me the truth, but it makes no sense," she says. "I wasn't planning on talking about The Primrose Path in any case."

Although members of Winnipeg's Jewish community may view the book as a fictionalized version of allegations against Rabbi Ephraim Bryks, formerly of the Herzlia Synagogue, Matas notes that people in every community in which she has spoken insist the book is an account of their community.

It's fascinating," she says. "In Montreal, a lady from Kingston insisted that the book was about the choirmaster in Kingston. In Toronto, someone in the audience was positive I was writing about a school teacher in the Jewish school system who was fired a couple of years ago. At the Shaarey Zedek some think it is about Winnipeg. I researched a number of cases. This is a universal story about a charismatic leader. I have done my job right if everyone sees their own community in the book."

Matas however emphasizes that The Primrose Path is a work of fiction. "I have never heard of anyone being sued for a book of fiction," she says. "The only parallel that comes to mind is the Iranian fatwa (death sentence) on Salman Rushdie. His was also a work of fiction."

She says she is saddened by the sisterhood's response. "Sam Wilder has apologized, but he didn't do the deed," she notes.

She reports that The Primrose Path has had only positive reviews. She also notes that she has spoken to other Jewish groups in Winnipeg without any problem.

"The problem is that too many organizations and institutions in the world want to keep these things quiet," she states. "I refuse to be intimidated."

Jewish Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity inaugurated at McMaster University

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

HAMILTON — Mitchell Gilbert may be in his second year of commerce studies, but when it comes to fraternity affiliation, the McMaster University student is just a neophyte.

Gilbert, 20, is president of Eta Omicron, Mac's fledgling chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEII), a Jewish fraternity founded in 1913 at New York University.

Alpha Epsilon Pi was a founding organization of Hillel International and now has about 5,000 campus members in 105 chapters across North America.

There are some 68,000 alumni, including Gary Bettman, National Hockey League commissioner; singers/songwriters Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel; and actors/comedians Richard Lewis and Gene Wilder.

Canadian chapters of AEII can be found at McGill University, the University of Western Ontario (where the frat has a rented house) and York University. All were established within the past decade. The three Canadian chapters have between 40 and 80 members each.

The McMaster chapter came about after Gilbert, who has a friend in the McGill chapter, discussed the idea with two Jewish students he met at a residence party in April.

McMaster has a student population of 15,000, of whom only an estimated 125 are Jewish. There is a campus Chabad House and an active Jewish Student Association.

Gilbert sees AEII as complementing them. "I love the JSA, but it's not everyone's cup of tea," he admitted.

Among the 12 Eta Omicron members, some have attended JSA programs only at the suggestion of fellow fraternity members who are also involved in the JSA, said Gilbert.

At this stage, frat activities at McMaster are primarily social. In January, Eta Omicron will join AEII members from York University for a bus trip to Pennsylvania State University. A community service project has been discussed for the upcoming term, he said.

Symbolic initiation rites exclude hazing

Typically, AEII offers a mix of social, cultural and philanthropic activities (last year's national project supported research into Tay-Sachs disease), opportunities for leadership development and networking with AEII chapters in other cities as well as with AEII alumni.

The McMaster neophytes will be initiated as "brothers" of AEII at a February Midwest Regional conclave to be held in Michigan.

Although the term "initiation" might raise eyebrows among the uninitiated, Gilbert stressed that the fraternity has a strict prohibition against hazing.

Their decades-old initiation rites are "symbolic but not demeaning," said AEII alumnus Danny Debow, a 22-year-old Torontonian who works out of AEII's Indianapolis headquarters as a chapter consultant and travels across North America.

The fraternity sets high standards, both behaviorally and academically, Debow explained. At Western, for example, AEII students have attended annual seminars for the past five years to raise awareness and diminish the incidence of date rape.

CJC considering a special fund for unity task force

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A special fund to finance a national unity task force to all Jewish communities in Canada is under consideration.

"We're working on it," said Jack Silverstone, Canadian Jewish Congress executive director. Although he did not name a specific figure, Silverstone said it "is a costly effort" and would involve "a substantial amount."

At the recent Congress national executive meeting, Unity Chair Max Bernard of Montreal told delegates there was no money available for Congress officers to visit the various Congress regions to bring information and answer questions about the future of Quebec.

Delegates from Western Canada and the Atlantic provinces said they wanted more information, and a decision by the Congress on national unity was deferred.

"It's apparent that in the national unity debate our Jewish communities have a real role to play," Silverstone said. "The unity question is the big question. We've got to save Canada from breaking up, otherwise the country is going to hell in a hand cart."

Bernard told the Congress national executive that he would like representatives of the Italian and Greek communities to join Congress officers on their visit to the regions. A coalition of the three communities on national unity already exists.

If Italian and Greek representatives take part in the cross-country trip they will look after their own expenses, Silverstone said.

Israel to invest heavily in Negev reclamation

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — More than 1 billion shekels will be spent by the Israel government in conjunction with the Jewish National Fund (JNF) and Jewish Agency (JA) for land reclamation and improvements in the Negev, according to a report, Action Plan Negev, released recently.

The report was made available to The CJN by the JNF Pacific region.

The Negev is Israel's largest land reserve, says the report, and will be required to make up for the shrinking land and water resources resulting from peace treaties. The designated area for cultivation totals about 1.26 million dunams.

The Negev is not uniform, therefore developing the relative advantages of each region will determine its specialization, while enlarging the population and transforming the Negev into an area of ongoing growth, says the report.

The report notes that the Negev touches Jordan, Egypt and the Gaza Strip and this could increase the volume of tourism as open borders enable the planning and marketing of tourist packages.

Listed among the projects of action Plan Negev are an increase of reservoirs and aquifers to step up the water supply, hopefully in cooperation with Jordan.

There will be a hot house park of over 500 dunams to include 50 hothouses, with a service building attached to each for use by farmers. The park will be operated by a private company which will lease space to farmers so they won't have to lay out capital. The hothouses will have new technologies to make it easier for farmers to compete in world markets.

The program also calls for hot houses belts, close to energy sources, packing plants and refrigeration. Areas within these belts will be allocated to farmers to erect and operate their own hothouses.

Because Israel's citrus orchards are mainly in the Coastal Plain, the growing demand for land for urban use has reduced citrus production. Under Action Plan, orchards will be moved to the south to areas where climate and soil are suitable for citrus cultivation. In the first few years, some 15,000 dunams of orchards, based on existing water quotas, will be established in the Besor region. Later, the plantation area will be expanded to 50,000 dunams.

Despite a worldwide increase in demand for fish, the report states, Israel supplies only 20 tons a year, falling short of local demands by 80,000 tons. To overcome this, fish farms will be established in concentrated belts on common infrastructure. The project will cover 100 dunams.

Olive production will be increased with the planting of 5,000 dunams of olive groves.

Land reclamation covering 12,000 dunams will be carried out in the Central Arava and area.

Arrangements will be made also to transfer water quotas from farmers who are not utilizing them now and this, it is expected, "will boost economic development by means of large scale cultivated expansion."

Action Plan was officially launched in July 1995 by then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin; Minister of Agriculture Yaacov Tzur and JNF chair Moshe Rivlin.

The report was issued by JA chair Avraham Burg, Yaacov Tzur and Moshe Rivlin.

Community mourns a double loss

Canada in the 1939 British Empire Games.

He was the founder of Atlantic Packaging Products Ltd., one of Canada's major paper products companies.

Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation, who conducted his funeral, praised him for "practical, action-oriented leadership," his loyalty to his family and community, and for being "personally unassuming, courteous, accessible, modest."

Phil Granovsky

Rabbi Schild noted that for many years, Granovsky had continued his many activities in spite of worsening health. "There was no surrender, no giving up."

Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, called Granovsky "a special leader with a combination of personal commitment, compassion and vision, well-known for his kindness and consideration."

Ben Schneider, executive vice-president of the Welfare Fund under Granovsky, remembered him as "someone who accepted innovation. He believed you had to have foresight, vision and a sense of direction."

Granovsky, he said, "used his power for the development of the community."

UJA campaign director Ted Sokolsky said that the community owes Granovsky an incalculable debt of gratitude. "He combined fundraising skills with genuine feeling for the welfare of individuals."

Granovsky's brother and business partner Irving summed up what many said; "he was quiet and softspoken, but very strong."

Granovsky is survived by his wife Shirley, children Ronald, Stanley, Maxine Gluskin and Fahla Irving, brother Irving and seven grandchildren.

newspaper's Montreal editorial board.

"Jack was truly a beloved personality," recalled Joe King, national director of Canadian Friends of TAU.

"He had a tremendous impact on the community, and a great personal charm. He was unfailingly a courteous gentleman."

King said Cummings was in Israel last May to attend honorary degree ceremonies at TAU and was himself considering an offer to accept an honorary degree by TAU.

Myer Bick, who had worked for Cummings in the real estate field and with him at a lay level at TAU during the late 1970s and early 1980s, said Cummings possessed the "unique ability to distil his full life's work and experience into wisdom for himself and for those around him.

"He was a gentleman, very caring, very passionate about his family, friends and community," Bick said.

Born on Nov. 9, 1922 to Queenie (Victoria Doris Wener), now deceased, and Maxwell Cummings, who survives him, Jack Lloyd Cummings attended Westmount High School and served a stint overseas with an artillery unit in the Royal Canadian Army from 1942 to 1945 before returning home to complete a bachelor of science degree at McGill University in 1946.

In 1947, Cummings, with his brother Robert and father, formed the real estate firm, Maxwell Cummings & Sons, and later, Cummings Properties Ltd., becoming the Canadian arm of the Trizec Corporation. Cummings continued to serve as chairman of the board of Maxwell Cummings & Sons Holdings Ltd.

Bick said the Cummings development firm built Canada's first-ever shopping centre in the Montreal suburb of St. Laurent, the Norgate, and was responsible as well for the construction of several of Calgary's first highrise towers, as well as Montreal's Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce building.

Cummings also once owned Montreal's landmark Windsor Hotel and developed the ski resort of Top Notch, in Stowe, Vt.

"That was his baby," Bick said. "He made it into a world-class resort."

Cummings' community activities included past and present leadership and executive positions with Maimonides Hospital, Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, Jewish General Hospital, McGill University, Ben-Gurion University, Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, Allied Jewish Community Services, Jewish Community Foundation, Canadian Jewish Congress, the YM-YWHA, and the Elmridge Golf and Country Club.

Cummings is survived by his wife of 47 years, Norma (Reitman), father Maxwell, brother Robert, sons Steven and Richard, daughter Nancy Gold and nine grandchildren.

Vancouver cantor sings for his art

Paintings help form bridge between people

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — In a different way of showing paintings, Cantor-Artist Mordechai (Robert) Edel literally sang his art for a large audience in the auditorium of the new Vancouver public library, designed by Moshe Safdie.

Edel, who is cantor at North Vancouver's Har El Synagogue, recently showed a large collection of his Judaic works, mainly in oil or acrylic or a combination of both, and had a song for almost every one. A number of his paintings are based on portions of daily and Shabbat services.

He uses vivid jewel-like colors generously, with the aim of giving a cheerful effect.

"It is with great thanks to the Almighty for the new material he has created and with which I am privileged to form my paintings," he said.

"The blessings we receive," he continued, "are for us to share. It is my wish that my paintings help form a bridge of understanding between all peoples, one with which we can help bring healing, happiness, joy and sanctification to our world."

A firm believer in the Kabbalistic belief in numbers, Edel sang, as an example, Moyshela, My Friend, for a painting of a little girl giving some pomegranate to a friend. There are 613 seeds in a pomegranate, he says, just as there are 613 mitzvot.

Jerusalem of Gold was an obvious song for Edel's brilliant painting of a golden Jerusalem.

For a painting he calls Shavuoth, he sings: "Enlighten our eyes in the Torah, cause our hearts to hold fast to the commandments, so that we may never be put to shame."

In Kol Rina, he sings and paints of joy and dancing in the streets. "It's something we should be doing every day," he said.

His massive 5 ft. x 8 ft. painting, the Lamed Vavniks, is colorful and joyous with mystical concepts, the artist explained.

"There are 36 righteous in every generation who sanctify our world. During the eight days of Chanukah, we light 36 candles. If we allow this light and the light of our one soul candle, we can soon find shalom. A simple formula for peace."

Edel presented Lamed Vavniks to former B.C. cabinet minister Grace McCarthy, president of CHILD (Children with Intestinal and Liver Disorders). She said the painting will be auctioned to raise funds for her organization.

Edel was born in England and trained in opera, liturgical music and art. Spiritual messages flow from his canvases. He has exhibited locally and his work is in collections in Toronto, New York, Tel Aviv and Paris.

Rhodes recipient readies for the Oxford experience

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Once you've won a Rhodes scholarship, where do you go from there?

For Lisa Grushcow, the answer comes easy: onward and upward.

Grushcow, 21, is on her way to Oxford University in England this fall to study Judaism and Christianity in the Greco-Roman world, courtesy of the Rhodes scholarhip, arguably the most prestigious academic grant in the world.

It is worth $24,000 per year, and Grushcow, who is majoring in political science and minoring in Judaic studies at McGill University, was one of only 11 Canadians — and two Quebecers — to win the Rhodes this year as recognition for her academic and extra-curricular achievements. Ninety-five were awarded worldwide.

And that only happened after Grushcow got through three hand-wringing interviews and a three-hour cocktail reception at which she and the other Quebec candidates had to demonstrate their best social skills.

Grushcow's stay at Oxford will be just one stop towards her ultimate goal: becoming a Conservative rabbi. After Oxford, she plans to train for the rabbinate at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Becoming a rabbi "is a combination of teaching and learning, of transforming Judaism, of making the ritual elements relevant to daily life," says the self-possesed Grushcow, who also is a social and political activist.

Her father, Marc, works in the computer programming field. Mother Ricki works for Ontario's Ministry of Health. Brother Jeremy is studying human biology and genetics at the Univeristy of Chicago.

Grushcow's own resume of activities looks like it belongs to someone twice her age.

Studies martial arts

Her on and off campus activities and recognitions have ranged from studying martial arts and working for the League for Human Rights, to being named to the Dean's honor list, playing trumpet, being involved in a host of student advocacy and feminist activities, and holding several posts in student affairs.

This year Gruschow is serving as McGill Student Society's vice-president of university affairs.

"I do what I do because I like what I do," she explains.

She likes studying the philosophical side of politics. But chemistry was a "nemesis."

"Nothing's a breeze," Grushcow said, despite a Grade Point Average (3.85) that most would die for.

Grushcow sees the Rhodes as an opportunity to demonstrate the potential in being both a scholar and an activist.

UJA Appreciation

TORONTO — The seniors at the Bathurst Jewish Centre ran a sold-out concert at the Leah Posluns Theatre recently, to show their appreciation to the United Jewish Appeal (UJA). They presented a cheque for $1,800 to Elliot Halperin of the UJA.

They did it in their own way and with their own members providing the comedy, singing and dancing, helped by entertainer par excellence Marvin Rosenshein, singer and story teller. The concert, attended by nearly 500, was sold out three weeks before the event.

Principal Honored

HAMILTON — Home and school must work together to provide a Jewish environment and Jewish education for our children if there is to be Jewish continuity, guests at a recent breakfast were told.

About 250 people attended the breakfast at the Adas Israel Synagogue, honoring Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA) principal, Rabbi Zev Eisenstein, and launching The Educational Endowment Fund (TEEF), newly established in conjunction with State of Israel Bonds.

Teaching to live the Jewish way and instilling Jewish values must begin in early childhood, Rabbi Eisenstein told his audience.

"If you wait till our children are older before telling them that a Jew must be caring, honest, proud to be a Jew, and that they must marry another Jew, then we've lost them, he warned.

While acknowledging that afternoon Hebrew and Sunday schools have their place, a day school, he suggested, "is the natural environment in which children learn early on what it is to be Jewish."

Awards of Excellence

HAMILTON — An original member of the Holocaust Education Committee of Hamilton-Wentworth & Area was one of two teachers recently awarded the Recognition of Excellence Award by the Hamilton Board of Education.

Beverley Lasky, a teacher for over 26 years, teaches junior kindergarten at George R. Allan public school. She also for many years taught a class of 11-year-olds at Beth Jacob religious school about the Holocaust.

She became involved with the Yom Hashoah committee which plans the annual commemoration program and, convinced of the need to educate the young about the Holocaust, she helped with the formation three years ago of the Holocaust Education Committee.

The second teacher honored was Helen Valenzuela, a secondary school languages teacher, who initiated a telecommunications program under which students can communicate with their counterparts in France and Japan.

WBJE Superintendent Resigns

WINNIPEG — Dr. Arnold Carmel has announced his resignation as of July 1996, as superintendent of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (WBJE).

He will be moving to Chicago to assume the position of headmaster of the Solomon Schechter Day Schools of Chicago.

Carmel is leaving Winnipeg reluctantly. It is not dissatisfaction with the WBJE, which has about 820 students, but rather immigration problems concerning his aged and ailing father-in-law that has led to his decision to relocate.

Carmel's major disappointment is that he won't be around for the opening of the Jewish Community Campus scheduled for September 1997. He worked to make sure that the BJE will have the right amount of square footage on campus — with room to expand if necessary — as well as state-of-the-art computer technology.

Wrestling With Angels

VICTORIA — A non-Jewish member of Victoria's Holocaust remembrance committee recently published an anthology of his poems which includes a number with a Holocaust theme.

Doug Beardsley, 54, who teaches a course in English literature at the University of Victoria (UVic), calls his book Wrestling with Angels. Each person wrestles with internal or external angels, the poet explained at a reading of his works where the book was launched.

A native of Montreal, he spent the first seven years of his life in the Snowdon area, which he describes as a cosmopolitan city within the larger city of Montreal.

Wrestling with Angels is published by Vehicule Press, Montreal, and distributed by General Distribution Services, Don Mills, Ont.

Video Against Violence

VICTORIA — The video, Take a Stand: Youth Against Violence is being used to help young people identify violence as a real concern, an issue they can do something about.

The video produced by the B.C. Ministry of the Attorney General is being used by 841-KOZ/Kid Zone, which travels the province conducting school and community workshops focusing on raising awareness of youth violence, overcoming fear and taking action.

The group consists of young people sponsored and trained by the ministry's youth programs division. The group also sponsors the Youth Against Violence hot line (1-800-680-GANG).

Panthers send rookie forward back to junior

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

POMPANO BEACH, Fla. — It was an unseasonably cool autumn day in South Florida — breezy, 70 degrees and sunny — when David Nemirovsky stepped off the ice at the Florida Panthers' practice facility.

Still dripping wet after the optional workout, he made his way through the Cats' modest training area and past teammates who were continuing their workouts on stationary bicycles.

Making some time for The CJN, Nemirovsky acknowledged that being on an NHL roster straight out of junior exceeded his expectations going into training camp.

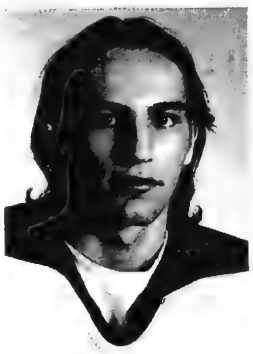
"It feels like all my hard work paid off," the 19-year-old right-winger said. "I'll have to work harder to keep improving."

A standout offensive player with the Ottawa 67s of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), Nemirovsky was the Panthers' fourth-round pick two years ago. He turned a few heads during training camp playing on the team's top line (at the time) with centre Rob Niedermayer and portsider Radek Dvorak, racking up five goals and one assist in seven games and earning a spot on the major league roster.

The regular season has proven to be another story. Although the team had played 35 games prior to the Christmas break, Nemirovsky had gotten into only nine, scoring two assists and registering a -2 in the plus/minus column.

Just before Christmas (or after Chanukah, depending on your perspective), Nemirovsky was "sent down to junior." However, he refused to report and instead returned to his family's north Toronto home.

"It's a matter of fact that I don't get along with [Ottawa coach Brian Kilrea]," Nemirovsky told The CJN. Citing personality differences, Nemirovsky said he has asked to be traded to another OHL team so he can finish the season.



David Nemirovsky

On departing Florida, Panthers GM Bryan Murray told him "to go back, have fun and get some ice time," Nemirovsky said. After the junior season ends, there's a good chance Florida will call him back, he added.

Murray told The CJN Nemirovsky had a very good training camp and played hard. "I don't think there's any doubt he'll be an NHL player. His skill level is high.

But, the GM continued, like all young players, Nemirovsky (six foot two, 192 lbs.) needs to get bigger, log more ice time and build up his game experience.

"We can't have him sitting out," he added.

"I came to camp knowing there was a youth movement and I had a chance to make the team," Nemirovsky said. "It was fun playing with Niedermayer and Dvorak. They have great speed. It was a great time."

Considering the Panthers — to the surprise of many media crystal ball gazers — have made it to the top of the NHL standings, cracking the Cats' starting lineup can no longer be considered an easy feat.

The Panthers are playing really well and have suffered no major injuries, so it was hard getting into games, Nemirovsky said.

After four months playing and practising with a top NHL outfit, Nemirovsky said "the thing that stands out is how hard everybody works. There are no slackers."

Nemirovksy began his climb to the NHL like numerous other hockey hopefuls, playing in the Metro Toronto junior league for the North York Rangers before moving on to the 67s. The son of immigrants from Odessa in the former Soviet Union, Nemirovsky was born in Canada but believes his style of play shows a strong Russian influence.

Beliveau bringing his skates

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hockey legend Jean Beliveau stood before reporters displaying his trademark smile and, at age 64, the very same level of charisma and class that marked his 18-year career with the Montreal Canadiens.

The occasion was a historic one for Maccabi Canada:

It announced that Beliveau — for the second time since 1985 — will lead up to 250 Canadian Jewish athletes to Israel as honorary chef de mission to the Maccabiah Games in Israel in the summer of 1997.

"This time there'll be a hockey rink," joked the former Canadiens captain.

So far, four teams — Canada, the United States, Israel and Russia — have signed on to compete.

"This time I can bring my skates," Beliveau said.

For Beliveau, Maccabi Canada made an offer he just couldn't refuse.

Beliveau never had the chance to compete as an amateur, so the experience of marching into Ramat Gan stadium a decade ago has stood with him as one of the most memorable of his life.

"Can you imagine what it's like for these youngsters to be in the land of Israel. It's all their dream," he said.

"How can you refuse when they want to honor you and their goals are so great?"

New process boosts success of marrow transplants

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new process has been developed to lessen the complications resulting from unrelated bone marrow transplants, Prof. Yair Reisner of the Weizmann Institute said recently.

Reisner was speaking to the annual meeting of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science held at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto.

While 60 per cent of those who need bone marrow transplants receive them either from members of the family or from bone marrow banks, some 40 per cent cannot find matches at all. This proportion is higher among ethnic populations, including Jews, Reisner noted.

The danger in transplants is twofold: Unless the match is perfect, the recipient's body can reject the new marrow (as happens in organ donations); or the transplanted material can reject the recipient's cells. The latter is called graft-vs-host disease, and is a common complication of the procedure.

Until now, massive doses of chemotherapy have been given, which wipe out both cancerous cells and most of the ordinary blood cells. It was hoped that this would prevent both kinds of rejection.

Unfortunately, Reisner said, it was not always effective.

Sloan-Kettering Institute in New York had developed a method of purifying the donor bone marrow, but there simply were not enough bone marrow cells for the procedure to be totally successful.

Research at the Weizmann Institute, as well as in Germany and Italy, led to the discovery that if certain hormones were given to the donor, more cells could be taken through the blood system.

This would mean that transplants could be made from unrelated donors, he said.

Although the process is in its infancy, results appear promising, Reisner said.

In reply to a question from the audience, Reisner said the new technique would decrease complications from matched donors as well.

At the meeting, Tom Beck, who has held the position for 13 years, resigned as president of the Canadian Society. The presidency was assumed by Sharon Zuckerman.

Other officers elected included Stephen Burns as secretary, Leonard Barkin as treasurer and Wolfe Goodman as honorary council.

National vice-president Marvin Tanner gave an impassioned plea for support to the Montreal community "as Jews and as Canadians," to form "a united front against a common enemy — [Lucien] Bouchard."

"Those of us in the eye of the storm are in the midst of troubling times," he said. "By a mere 50,000 votes, Canada could have gone down the drain. If that had happened, you would also be directly affected — one of the most vibrant communities in the Diaspora could go down the drain."

Pravachol helps reduce the risk of heart attack

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recent studies have shown a new drug, Pravachol, is effective in lowering cholesterol and in reducing the risk of heart attack.

Pravachol (pravastatin), a product of Bristol-Myers Squibb, has been prescribed since 1990 to treat high cholesterol, when diet and exercise have not been successful. A media release explains that "the drug fights the buildup of harmful cholesterol that can lead to clogging of the arteries, resulting in heart disease."

Ex-Montrealer Dr. Joseph Minkowitz, a cardiologist at Markham-Stouffville Hospital, and an enthusiastic spokesperson for Pravachol, told The CJN that previously used drugs lowered the risk of heart attack, but didn't lower the mortality rate. In other words, the patient had an increased risk of dying from something else.

Dr. Joseph Minkowitz

In 1990, he said, a new group of drugs, statins (of which Pravachol is one) were developed, which were found to be safe, easy to take and had minimal side effects.

An independent, five-year, double-blind, placebo-controlled study referred to as the West of Scotland (WOS) study, was undertaken, under the leadership of Dr. James Shepherd.

(Double-blind, placebo-controlled, Minkowitz explained, is the only kind of scientific study now considered valid. Neither the doctor nor the patient knows whether the patient is taking the actual drug or a placebo, so bias, on either side, cannot possibly play a role.)

The study found that Pravachol is effective both for those who had already had a heart attack, and also for those who were at risk, but had never actually had heart disease.

Effective is almost too mild a term. Minkowitz calls the numbers "staggering:" 31 per cent less chance of having a first heart attack, a 22 per cent lower risk of death and a 32 per cent lower chance of death from heart disease.

The study was carried out on 6,595 men between the ages of 45 and 64. The results, Minkowitz said, can, however be reliably extrapolated to women, who, while they have a lower risk of heart disease, when they do suffer from it, get sicker and don't do as well after bypass surgery.

Side effects studied

As well, their risk rises from .3 per cent between 30 and 39 to 7.5 per cent in their 60s — a whopping 25 times jump, as compared to men whose risk factor only rises by six times.

A five year study is sufficient for any side effects to become manifest, Minkowitz explained. Pravachol is singularly free of them, although some patients have complained of skin rash (a common side effect of many drugs, he said), muscle cramps and changes in liver blood tests, which reverse when the drug is stopped.

Changes in lifestyle simply don't translate into effective lowering of cholesterol, he said. "It's very demanding, to follow a diet low in fat and calories and to exercise." Nevertheless, it must be lowered, because, he said, "cholesterol is a killer."

Political reality has changed along the Green Line

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — For Israelis living along the Green Line, the geography has not changed, but political reality has.

In recent weeks, Israeli troops withdrew from several West Bank towns, leaving these Arab population centres under the control of the Palestinian Authority.

This means that Israel's security grip on these Palestinian towns has loosened considerably.

It is therefore no surprise that Jewish residents of neighboring settlements and towns are nervous.

As long as these West Bank towns were in Israeli hands, it seemed as if the Arab neighbors were far away, a remote entity with which Israeli security forces could deal.

But now that the Palestinians have taken control, some feel that the towns and their Arab residents have moved dangerously closer.

"I have 50,000 residents in the Gilo neighborhood," said Shmuel Meir, deputy mayor of Jerusalem, voicing a general concern.

Gilo, a neighborhood in southern Jerusalem, is situated close to such Palestinian-controlled areas as Beit Jala and Bethlehem, across the Green Line.

Prior to the 1967 Six Day War, the Green Line marked the border between Israel and Jordan. Now it separates the West Bank from Israel.

"I would like to know what's going to happen to them," Meir said of Gilo's residents. "Do I need to put more guards in the schools? Do I have to open emergency centres?"

In Gilo, residents are fearfully confronting the new facts on the ground.

In the past, they knew that Israeli soldiers and border police were patrolling the streets of Bethlehem and Beit Jala.

But now, people are wondering how long it will take before a Palestinian sniper takes a position atop a hill in Beit Jala and chooses living targets in the adjacent Jewish neighborhood.

Their fears are not merely a case of mass hysteria.

There have been real changes on the ground and with them, real dangers.

Israeli residents along the Green Line are acutely aware that in the event any hostilities take place, the Israeli military's hands are tied.

Theoretically, under the terms of Israel's agreements with the Palestinians, Israeli security forces can chase Palestinian perpetrators into areas within the autonomy.

But in practice, such a scenario is unlikely.

As a general rule, the army wants to stay out of areas it has evacuated — which includes Jenin, Tulkarm, Nablus, Kalkilya and Bethlehem. The sixth and final withdrawal for the year was in Ramallah.

For the time being, at least, the main problems confronting Israelis from over the Green Line are criminal acts, not terrorism.

Since Israeli troops withdrew from Jenin a month ago, some 90 cars owned by Israelis were stolen and taken there.

And cars are not the only items being looted.

Everything that can be stolen from Jewish homes along the new front, from chickens to television sets, finds its way to the other side of the Green Line.

In a recent television interview, a resident of the Alfei Menashe settlement, located just more than a mile inside the West Bank from the Green Line, recalled how she had seen a Palestinian youth coming out of her house with a television set.

As she yelled at him to return the television, the boy teased her: "Come and get me. Why don't you come and get me?" and disappeared toward a neighboring Arab village.

This new source of tension along the Green Line does as much damage to the Palestinians as to their Israeli neighbors — if not more.

More and more Israeli farmers are using Thais as farm laborers to replace Palestinians workers.

And Israeli shoppers are wary of crossing the Green Line to visit markets in Palestinian towns.

Palestinians cheer as Israel leaves Ramallah

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army withdrew Dec. 27, 1995, from the West Bank town of Ramallah as Palestinians cheered, waved flags and hurled stones at the departing troops.

The pullout was carried out a day ahead of schedule and less than a month before the Palestinian elections, scheduled for Jan. 20.

The withdrawal from the town of 30,000 took place in the afternoon, when six Israeli jeeps drove away from the police station in the centre of town.

Thousands of Palestinians converged on the site, waving Palestinian flags and chanting, "Soldiers, go away."

Dozens of boys ran after the jeeps, throwing stones.

The withdrawal from Ramallah completed a two-month process in which Israel — fulfilling the terms of an accord signed September in Washington for extending West Bank autonomy — handed over six towns and more than 400 Arab villages in the area to Palestinian control.

Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat told reporters in the Gaza Strip that he hoped to make Ramallah, located some seven miles north of Jerusalem, the new centre of the Palestinian Authority's activities.

Jewish settlers living nearby expressed concern about their future safety, despite a bypass road completed earlier this week that was built for their security needs.

Under the Israel-PLO accords, the 144 Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza will remain in place during the five-year interim-phase agreement that ends in May 1999.

The future of the settlements, as well as the highly sensitive issue of Jerusalem, is to be discussed in the final-status negotiations, slated to begin this spring.

An adviser to Arafat said that the rock-throwing during the Ramallah redeployment was not an indication of the kind of regard the Palestinians held for the peace process.

"People felt much pain" during the 28-year period of Israeli rule over the West Bank, Dr. Ahmed Tibi told Israel Radio.

"But you must also remember that during the redeployment from Jenin and Bethlehem, people gave the [Israeli] troops flowers," he added. "Those are the kinds of scenes I like to remember, from Jenin and Bethlehem."

Israel/Syria talks building momentum

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

After a disquieting interlude of six months, Israel and Syria launched a fresh round of peace talks last week, and are scheduled to resume the dialogue early this year.

If all goes according to plan, Warren Christopher — the U.S. secretary of state — will return to the Middle East around Jan. 10 in an attempt to capitalize on the momentum. Washington hopes that Israel and Syria can sign a declaration of principles by the spring.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Israel and Syria, whose on-again, off-again talks since 1992 have produced no tangible breakthroughs as yet, headed into last week's negotiations in Maryland exuding prudent optimism and with a high sense of urgency.

The signals from both sides were unmistakably positive. Prime Minister Shimon Peres indicated that Israel was prepared for wide-ranging, open-ended negotiations that may finally settle the status of the Golan Heights (which Israel annexed in 1981) and bring Lebanon and much of the rest of the Arab world into the "circle of peace."

Peres' predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated on Nov. 4, preferred to focus on the security dimension. On two separate occasions in the past year, the chiefs of staff of the Israeli and Syrian armies met to thrash out the issues, but the results were clearly disappointing and President Hafez al-Assad of Syria cancelled the talks, sending them into limbo.

Last October, the United States tried to coax Israel and Syria back to the negotiating table. Christopher visited Jerusalem and Damascus, but returned home empty-handed, citing "solid differences" between Israel and Syria.

There the matter lay, stagnating and seemingly impervious to a solution. By all accounts, Rabin had despaired of signing a pact with Syria before Israel's general election in November 1996.

But with Rabin's murder, the dynamics of the situation suddenly changed, notwithstanding the fact that Syria had refrained from conveying official condolences to Israel. As it was noted, Syria's response was cooly factual, proof of the profound bitterness, suspicion and hostility that characterize Damascus' attitude to Israel.

In retrospect, Rabin's untimely death reinvigorated the push toward peace, reinforcing the credo that politics is and has always been the art of the possible.

In his very first speech to the Knesset, Peres broke with Rabin's approach. He invited Syria to join in talks without preconditions and outlined a vision of a new, prosperous Middle East in which Syria would play a central role. Then, in the United States, Peres declared he was convinced that peace was in the offing. In an important signal, the state-controlled Syrian media welcomed his remarks.

On the heels of these developments, Ehud Barak — Israel's foreign minister — held out an olive branch. "Let us now make peace," he said at a conference in Barcelona. Farouk al-Shara, the Syrian foreign minister, replied in a respectful tone that Syria was ready to commit itself "to full peace in return for full withdrawal."

In the weeks leading up to the talks in Maryland, when American diplomats visited the region, further signals were exchanged.

Dennis Ross, the chief U.S. Middle East negotiator, said that both sides were "serious" about reaching a settlement. Peres spoke glowingly of "a new beginning" and pointedly linked the depth of an Israeli withdrawal to the depth of Syria's willingness to normalize relations with Israel.

From Syria came word that Assad was impressed with Peres' "openness" and that he was interested in accelerating the pace of the negotiations. As an added sweetener, Shara said that Damascus sought tranquility in Lebanon, a Syrian protectorate whose territory has been a springboard for guerrilla attacks against Israel since the late 1960s.

Despite the promising new mood, incredibly difficult problems block the path toward an accommodation.

First and foremost, Assad still insists on a complete Israeli withdrawal, not just to the 1949 armistice lines but to the borders Syria occupied until the Six Day War, the borders adjacent to the northeastern shores of the Sea of Galilee.

Israel has not publicly spelled out its policy, but Peres may be more flexible than Rabin in this respect, provided he is truly convinced that Syria is psychologically prepared for peace with all its trappings. In any event, Barak said recently that Israel does not exclude the possibility of recognizing Syrian sovereignty over the Golan.

Such a move would be fiercely resisted by the Likud (which tabled an unsuccessful non-confidence motion against the government last week) and by the Golan's 14,000 Jewish settlers and their legion of vocal supporters in Israel.

Security issues are also at stake. Syria has repeatedly rejected an Israeli proposal for early-warning stations on the Golan following a withdrawal. Last week, Israel modified its position, saying that such posts may be unncessary should Syria agree to pull back its army sufficiently far from the border.

Water is another stumbling block. The Golan supplies about one-third of Israel's fresh water. Is Syria willing to share this vital resource?

All these crucial questions, and many more, will be addressed when Israel and Syria get down to real bargaining later this month.

Critics assail Israel's recent crackdown on free speech

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A Jewish Agency clerk was having coffee with a friend last month when someone overheard his conversation. The next thing he knew he was taken in for questioning by police. The grounds? Undermining the peace process.

The story is just one of dozens of similar episodes that demonstrate the dramatic change in Israel since the murder of Yitzhak Rabin. Until Nov. 4, a driver could run a government minister off the road, an extremist group could engage in illegal paramilitary training and a religious leader could call on soldiers to disobey orders — all with impunity.

But since the assassination, the country's judicial system has begun flexing its muscles. Rarely-used clauses, such as sedition, are being invoked with increasing regularity. The tough new stance has resulted in the arrest of leaders of the right-wing protest movement Zo Artzeinu, the investigation of rabbis for halachic interpretation that may be construed as incitement, as well as numerous smaller incidents like the case of the Jewish Agency clerk.

Excessive?

No, says Tel Aviv University law professor Ze'ev Segal. "Until Nov. 4, we thought there was no danger to Israeli democracy. But we were wrong." Segal is one of a growing number of public figures to back the new judicial toughness. "Inciters should be brought to trial," he maintains. "Democracy must defend itself."

Many agree according to a recent Haifa University survey which found 54 per cent of Israeli Jews favor limitations on freedom of speech in the aftermath of the Rabin murder. They share the view that an unchecked atmosphere of hatred and incitement against Rabin ultimately led to his murder.

"What is a legitmate expression of opposition in a period of peace and tranquilty is considered to be incitement and insurrection in a situation of war or crisis," says historian Dr. Eyal Naveh. "Freedom of speech is determined by context. The words of [Rabbi Meir] Kahane's supporters and provocative halachic rulings must be censored not because of their essence, but because of the change in atmosphere in which these words are heard."

Even those who decry the latest series of arrests acknowledge the need for a new verbal restraint. Elyakim Ha'Ezni, a right-wing lawyer and settlement leader who is himself under investigation for incitement, called the recent clampdown a "dictatorship of peace." But he admits that he wouldn't use the same expressions today that he used before the murder.

In the past, he repeatedly compared Rabin to Henri Petain, the World War II general and premier of Vichy France who was later convicted of treason. "I wouldn't make such a comparison again," says Ha'Ezni. "At the same time I didn't believe such a thing [as the murder] could happen ... Now the atmosphere has changed. We all have to realize that there may be other potential murderers among us, and we must choose our words carefully."

But many say the heightened sensitivity to words has reached absurd levels. The attorney general castigated the police recently for arresting people in barber shops, banks and cafes for what turned out to be not incitement, but bad taste. One of the arrested was a man in line at the bank. When asked, "Who's next?" he had the poor judgment to respond "Peres."

"We're searching for incitement on the walls of the washrooms of Bar-Ilan University," charged political science professor Michael Keren. "Even in the most extreme circumstances freedom of speech must not be curbed," insists Keren of Tel Aviv University. "Opposition groups must be able to vent steam through verbal expression rather than through more dangerous means." He also warns that by depriving extremists of freedom of speech the authorities are inadvertently turning them into heroes. (Indeed Ha'Ezni recently compared his struggle to that of Martin Luther King's.)

The most controversial charge leveled against opposition groups is that of sedition. This rarely-invoked clause, which outlaws expression that lead to "hatred, ridicule and disloyalty to the country," is one of the vestiges of British Mandatory law. But even some outspoken left-wingers cringe at the use of this charge against the leaders of the Zo Artzeinu movement, which in addition to verbally challenging the legitimacy of the government, has held illegal demonstrations, blocking roads and disrupting traffic.

"If it's possible to charge the leaders of Zo Artzeinu for their acts ... why bother resorting to this problematic law?" asked an editorial in the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz, adding that this clause is "inappropriate for a democracy."

The editors called for a distinction between "illegal acts which must be punished and unusually infuriating expressions. The answer to bad taste should be in words, not arrests and investigations."

Legal affairs commentator Moshe Negbi agrees. "Limiting free speech is justified only when there is a high probability of danger that words will cause violent acts. Otherwise we must swallow even the harshest expressions."

Negbi cites the case of an army officer who was sentenced to 10 days in military prison for failing to mourn Rabin's murder in an appropriate fashion (When the case was exposed in the media, the army promptly released the officer from prison.)

"After this incident there is a justifiable outcry," notes Negbi, who warns that the real danger Israel faces is the blurring of the distinction between such petty incidents and serious threats to democracy. "While we're sentencing this so-called "dangerous" officer to 10 days in prison, someone in a position of influence, who advocates violence, is going free. It's not only undemocratic — it's dangerous."

Israel allocates $160,000 to Reform, Conservative groups

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Advancing the cause of religious pluralism in Israel, the Religious Affairs Ministry will allocate some $160,000 to the Reform and Conservative movements in the Jewish state.

Secular organizations that deal with Jewish issues from a pluralistic perspective are also expected to receive funding.

Israel's High Court of Justice previously ruled that the Reform and Conservative movements should receive funding from the Religious Affairs Ministry for Torah studies.

But until now, only small amounts were disbursed in an informal matter.

In New York, the move by the Religious Affairs Ministry was welcomed by Rabbi Alexander Schindler, outgoing president of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

"I could not be more delighted," he said.

The announcement of the allocations reportedly came in the wake of new funding criteria established by Religious Affairs Minister Shimon Shetreet, who has sought to eliminate inequities in funding for non-Orthodox institutions.

The allocations provoked criticism from Orthodox parties in Israel.

Knesset member Avraham Ravitz, of the Orthodox Degel HaTorah Party, said Shetreet "did something that should not have been done, when he allowed the Reform movement to embezzle the public coffers.

"The Reform movement has lots of money already, and it is outrageous that it should swoop down on the meager allowances of the Religious Affairs Ministry," Ravitz said.

However, Knesset member Avner Shaki of the National Religious Party, a former minister of the Religious Affairs Ministry, was more accepting of the decision.

"Their way is not mine," he said of the Reform and Conservative movements. "But it is a good deed to teach every Jew the Torah."

In related news, Jewish Agency for Israel chair Avraham Burg has called for the establishment of a religious conversion court comprised of non-Orthodox rabbis to provide alternatives to Orthodox conversions in Israel.

If non-Orthodox conversions that are performed abroad are recognized in Israel, he said, then there should be a way to perform them in Israel as well.

Burg said that if his proposal for establishing non-Orthodox conversions in Israel were not adopted, then the government should fund overseas conversions for all Israelis who want them.

The Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling that paved the way for possible Knesset legislation to enable the recognition of non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel.

Orthodox parties are actively opposed to such legislation.

of talks, the two sides agreed to address a number of issues at the same time in an effort to prevent the negotiations from becoming deadlocked over any one particular issue.

"We're satisfied with the atmosphere, the openness, and the approach,"one Israeli official said, but he would reveal nothing about the substance of the talks, citing the parties' commitment to maintaining confidentiality.

At various points, the meetings included Syrian Ambassador to the U.S. Walid Mualem, Michael Wahbi, director of Syria's Foreign Minister's Office, Israel's Ambassador to the U.S. Itamar Rabinovich and Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir. Foreign Ministry legal advisor Joel Singer and his Syrian counterpart, Riad Daoudi held separate discussions.

In Damascus, Foreign Minister Farouk Shara, who met with seven Arab foreign ministers to discuss the peace process, said he is optimistic about the renewed negotiations.

Israel's Foreign Minister Ehud Barak was a little more guarded than Shara. "The atmosphere is really good and the dialogue is positive and I think that the next few days will lead to some kind of general shifting of the positions of both side," he told Israel Radio.

But he added, "I think that we can expect long negotiations that will conclude stages that will not be simple and even difficult. I don't think this is something that will wind up in a few weeks.

"For us, the main question is to what extent the Syrians are ready or open to appropriate security arrangements. In the end, our formula is the depth of the peace and security arrangements."

Meanwhile, Israeli officials categorically denied that Israel has requested a financial package from the United States to pay for security systems on the Golan and to compensate residents who could be uprooted by the terms of a peace treaty.

One official said, "There's no agreement, so how could we have approached the Americans?"

He did concede that planning for such a package might be under way in Jerusalem. But, he said that the entire notion of a $12 billion package, as reported in Israel last week, might be a trial balloon to elicit Washington's response.

Call It Sleep: The death of Henry Roth last October at the age of 89 marked the passage of one of the most enigmatic figures in modern Jewish literature.

Roth was best known for Call It Sleep, his astonishingly pure novel that captured the Jewish immigrant experience in America. Told from the point of view of a boy who is the son of immigrant parents to New York, Call It Sleep was published in 1934, when its author was only 28 years old. Although the book was received favorably when first published, it sold only several thousand copies and quickly faded into obscurity.

The book was rediscovered in the 1960s, however, and more than one million copies of a 1964 paperback edition were sold. Many critics, including Irving Howe, have hailed the novel as one of the great American novels of the 20th Century. "Call It Sleep is one of the most important, pivotal novels of classic American literature," said Ruby Newman, a professor of literature at York University in Toronto.

According to Newman, Roth, by relating the narrative through the point of view of a child, used a Joycean story-telling technique, even while paying close attention to the cadences and rhythms of the Yiddish language that the boy's parents speak throughout. "He's fused these two techniques together," Newman said, "and he's used techniques of Yiddish literature. He's used the Yiddish language to make his English so lyrical and beautiful."

After publication of Call It Sleep, Roth attempted a second novel, but gave up after writing 75 pages, and did not publish anything again for 60 years. In the interim, he worked at a series of blue-collar jobs, eventually bought a duck and goose farm, and became an ardent communist until the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. The communists supported the Arabs, but Roth preferred to support the Jewish state, and came to view Israel as "a place where the Jewish writer can live his entire life with a sense of belonging — and a chance of maintaining his identity intact."

The renewed success of Call It Sleep allowed Roth to turn once again, with greater determination, to his writing. From 1979 until his death, he worked feverishly, despite crippling arthritis, on a literary project called Mercy of a Rude Stream (the title is from a line from Shakespeare). During that time, he produced some 3,500 manuscript pages divided among a series of six related novels, the first of which -- A Star Shines over Mt. Morris Park -- was issued in 1994. A Diving Rock on the Hudson came out in 1995, and more titles are expected in 1996.

Henry Roth is survived by a sister and two sons, including Jeremy Roth of Toronto.

Manor Boy Brings Boogie to Big Apple: Eye On Arts broke bagels in a New Jersey cafe recently with "Boogie" Mike Barris, who performed a two-hour set of vintage blues and jazz tunes that was more reminiscent of the Mississippi delta than the north Toronto suburb of Bathurst Manor where he grew up.

An editor of online financial news on Wall St. by day, the former Torontonian, who now lives with his wife Bonnie in Little Silver, N.J., has played often in clubs in the New York City and New Jersey areas. Barris says he is on a mission to revive America's musical heritage at festivals, coffeehouses and clubs. "A lot of kids don't know that before rock there were all these other types of music, from blues to ragtime to swing, and I'm bringing it back," he told Eye on Arts.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

National Unity Week: Travel, as they say, broadens the mind. It may also help strengthen the fabric of national unity. Last October, two airlines and other organizations offered discounted fares to help bring Canadians to Montreal for the memorable national unity rally that arguably helped the federalist side prevail in the referendum.

Now a few Canadian travel professionals have discussed marking the anniversary of the Montreal rally next October with a National Unity Week, during which air, rail, hotel, car-rental, tourist-attraction and other travel-related fares would be substantially reduced. The idea is to encourage Canadians from all regions of Canada to see any other region.

Even the most ardent Quebec separatists would be welcome to take advantage of these travel bargains. Perhaps it might even help them appreciate the greatness of this Dominion.

Travel Talk hopes the idea catches on. If you do too, please let us know. Contact Travel Talk in writing c/o The CJN, or by e-mail at 76075.507@compuserve.com.

Thus, it makes perfect sense that Israel is hosting the world's leading lights in the diamond business next month. The International Diamond and Jewelry Fair takes place in Tel Aviv, Jan. 7 to 10, 1996. It involves gala social events, seminars, sightseeing and much more. Nina Wright: Arts and Communication Counsellors

Company finds sponsors for cultural events

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Nina Wright is one of the most successful matchmakers in this country. But her clients don't end up under the chupah.

Wright, 64, makes shidduchs between business and arts organizations. Her company, Arts and Communication Counsellors (A&CC), finds corporate sponsors for high-profile Canadian cultural events such as the 1994 Barnes exhibition and the National Ballet of Canada's New Nutcracker, now playing at the O'Keefe Centre.

When it needed money to mount this new production the ballet company turned to Wright. Through her efforts, BPI Financial Corporation celebrated its 10th anniversary with a $500,000 gift, the largest corporate donation ever given to the National Ballet.

Wright has been responsible for over 150 sponsorships. "We turn down more than we take. We only do a few things," she said recently at A&CCs downtown headquarters.

Dozens of posters of cultural events from the 1995 Barbara Hepworth Retrospective to the 1979 King Tut exhibit adorn the walls of the office. Each poster, like a trophy, represents a successful sponsor partnership brokered by A&CC.

The leading cultural organizations of this country like the Royal Ontario Museum, the Cirque de Soleil, and Edmonton's Citadel Theatre are among A&CCs clients as are hundreds of blue-chip heavy weights which include CIBC, Chrysler Canada and Joseph E. Seagram and Sons Ltd.

Arts & sports are obvious beneficiaries

Arts and sports organizations are the obvious beneficiaries of these sponsorships. But corporate philanthropy is not solely based on altruism: these partnerships are mutually beneficial according to Wright.

Sponsorship can be an effective marketing tool to enhance a corporation's image and increase its exposure to the general public, she said. "Much of what happens is strategic philanthropy. It actually accomplishes some business."

Nina Wright, of Arts and Communications Counsellors. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

By virtue of its sponsorship, the public will come to associate BPI with some of the positive characteristics of the National Ballet — its longevity and reputation for quality performance, Wright explained.

The returns of philanthropy can also be greater than advertising, she added citing Lexus' sponsorship of The William S. Paley Collection at the Montreal Museum of Fine Art in 1995 — the company was allowed to put a car in the museum.

"Many car companies buy advertising space in magazines. You couldn't buy the space in the museum," she said. "A car in a museum. That's a mind set. That already says to you, 'This car is very beautiful.' "

Wright, a native New Yorker, had an intuitive understanding of strategic philanthropy — she coined the term — early in her career. She pioneered the concept of integrating corporate sponsorships with marketing programs back in the '50s.

In 1951, she began working for the American Federation of Arts, a non-profit organization based in New York City. She was responsible for organizing travelling exhibitions of art collections.

She and the organizers wanted to put together more ambitious projects, but government financing was limited. So she turned to the corporations.

In those days money for the arts used to come out of a corporation's donations budget, she said. "The marketing and the donations departments rarely talked to each other."

Getting the two department to collaborate was an innovative move, but for Wright "it was pure common sense." She pointed out that the people to whom the arts could mean something were the consumers, the same group targeted by the corporations.

She was so successful at tapping corporate coffers the public relations firm Ruder Finn and Rotman lured her to the private sector in 1958, hiring her to head their newly created fine arts division, which later became known as Arts and Communications.

By the mid 1960s, Wright's boardroom finesse had changed the way many top American cultural institutions approached fundraising. She developed philanthropic programs for many corporate giants such as American Express, Mobil Oil and General Electric.

In 1973, Wright set out to blaze a trail on a new frontier — Canada. She opened an A&CC office in Toronto when she moved here with her 10-year-old son, Tom, following her marriage to Canadian business executive Norman Wright, president of Vertek Vision.

Initially business at A&CCs Toronto office was slow: many Canadian non-profit organizations, accustomed to a high level of government subsidization, were not eager to woo corporate patrons, Wright said. "Everyone has to prove themselves."

It took her six years. The turning point for the Canadian leg of her career came in 1979 with the success of the King Tut exhibition sponsored by American Express.

"It was one of the greatest shows that had ever been to Toronto and corporate funding helped make it possible," Wright said. "The awareness level of what corporations could accomplish by the association with a visual project became apparent overnight."

She described the growth of A&CCs Toronto office, originally part of Rudder, Finn and Rotman as "slow and careful." It started out as a two-person operation. Today there is a staff of 13 — as well as a Calgary office run by Karyn Allen Keenan.

"It's a passion."

In 1988, Wright bought the Canadian branch of A&CC from the parent company and expanded its scope by adding a sports and recreational division a year later.

The company's total earnings are in the range of $1.5 million a year. But for Wright the money is secondary to the work.

"It isn't a business. It's a passion," she said. "You get paid but it's not big business. You know when you come here you work on fascinating things and hopefully things that make a difference."

She gives a lot of credit to her hard-working staff, she said. "I've never seen such an incredible group of women." She emphasized that there's a team work approach to most projects, whether the company is orchestrating high-profile special events like the Bay Street Rat Race or identifying new projects and corporate players.

The company has a highly sophisticated system for tracking the fiscal health of companies to narrow the range of potential sponsors, Wright said. "When we undertake a project and target a company we believe in a rifle not a buckshot approach."

A&CC can only be retained by one side of a partnership. If it's working on behalf of an arts organization it cannot work for the corporate sponsor until the "deal is consummated," she said.

Wright loves her work and puts in 12-hour days, she said, enthusing about up-coming projects like the 1997 Maud Lewis exhibition, and poetry in the Toronto subway.

BENJAMIN'S PARK MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Halifax actress magical as Dorothy in Oz

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 3,000 people roared their approval at Halifax's Rebecca Cohn Auditorium as Dorothy led the Tin Man, Scarecrow and Cowardly Lion down the Yellow Brick Road.

And the applause thundered as Dorothy musically imagined what was Over The Rainbow.

Members of Halifax's Jewish community, comprising a small part of the audience, almost burst with pride when 18-year-old Heidi Lipkus as Dorothy brought audiences at three weekend performances of the Wizard of Oz to their collective feet.

Lipkus, a first-year arts student at Dalhousie University, starred in a Nova Scotia Drama League production of Oz. Director Eva Moore was happy to have her aboard.

"She just soaks everything in and gives you a big smile," Moore said. "She has a great deal of talent. It will be a shame if she doesn't get into the theatrical field."

Lipkus came late to the Oz production. Auditions for the lead roles were held early last summer while she was a counsellor at Camp Kadimah. Moore had seen 15 or 16 potential Dorothys and cut the numbers to a short list by mid-August.

"I hadn't seen Heidi, except in Queen Elizabeth High School productions, and even then she didn't have leads so I didn't really remember her," said Moore. "But everyone I spoke to said, 'You must see her!' "

Looking for a "fresh young look with the maturity to handle a monstrous role but still look like an 11-year-old," Moore invited Lipkus to the call-back session.

"She had an intangible quality you always hope to find. Her voice needed work but there was a light inside her."

Lipkus first started performing at Kadimah when, at age 11, she played Sandy in Grease. She performed in the Atlantic Hagadah a few years later, in Les Miserables at Kadimah, and in a number of high school musicals.

She played in Oliver, was Grandma Tzeitl in Fiddler, and Gloria Thorpe in Damn Yankees. At Camp Biluim in 1994, she was Joseph in The Technicolor Dreamcoat and was the narrator in an Atlantic Jewish Council production of Joseph that played Halifax and Moncton.

"I've always loved the theatre," said Lipkus. "I've enjoyed watching and performing. Playing Dorothy was by far the most challenging thing I've ever done. I had to interpret the role to feel comfortable with Dorothy as the child everyone has in them. The audience [a good blend of adults and children] certainly gives you energy."

Lipkus said she'll complete her BA, then possibly go into education or journalism. "My dream is to go to Broadway but realism might stop me," she said with a smile.

Tensions linger in NYC

By ADAM DICKTER
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — Even as police investigate the role of race-baiting protesters in the violence at Freddy's Fashion Mart, and as Jewish and black leaders struggle to find common ground in the aftermath, some of the protesters have yet to cool their rhetoric.

Morris Powell, chair of the 125th Street Vendors Association, held a memorial service Dec. 17 at the charred ruins of the Jewish-owned store in Harlem for Roland Smith Jr., the man police said opened fire on customers and employees before setting Freddy's ablaze and shooting himself Dec. 8. Seven people, in addition to Smith, died in the carnage.

Powell also led a group of protesters one day after the massacre to Bargain World, another Jewish-owned store on 125th Street. Powell could not be reached for comment.

"I was astonished with the bad taste these folks have to protest while the bodies were still in the morgue," said Kenneth Stern, the American Jewish Committee's program specialist on anti-Semitism and extremism. "These are ideologues and haters [who] see the world in that particular way because they're so invested in their hatred of white people and Jews."

Michael Meyers, the executive director of the New York Civil Rights Coalition, predicted, "The rhetoric is not going to calm down, not going to go away because these people are so mesmerized by their own rhetoric. They believe in their cause and they believe there is a conspiracy among whites to deprive them of their status as blacks."

The Rev. Al Sharpton, a local activist whose role in the protests against Freddy's preceding the attack is being investigated by police and Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, offered to meet with Jewish leaders for a dialogue.

"I don't think there's anything to be gained by such a dialogue," said Martin Begun, president of the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York. "What could come out of such a meeting, a different degree of anti-Semitism, that you can hate the Jews on Wednesdays only?"

Sharpton did not return calls. For months, demonstrators had gathered outside Freddy's to protest the store owner's expansion plans that reportedly would have displaced a record store that is black-owned. The landlord for both stores is the United House of Prayer, a predominantly black church.

Meanwhile, Jewish and black leaders continued to push for cooperation last week, emphasizing that the views of Sharpton, Powell and their supporters are an aberration.

At a joint press conference Dec. 18, Abraham Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and Hugh Price of the National Urban League outlined what they called an "agenda of work" to reduce racial tensions.

The agenda includes calling on political and community leaders to speak out against bigotry regardless of the religion and race of the perpetrator; intensifying community-based harmony programs; encouraging the prosecution of perpetrators of bias-motivated crimes using penalty-enhancing hate crimes statutes and creation of multi-ethnic coalitions for public policy.

"Our standing together is a statement against exclusion, against separation," said Foxman, ADL's national director, at the offices of the National Urban League here.

Also joining the healing effort was New York Coun. Noach Dear from Brooklyn, who said he has reached out to Coun. C. Virginia Fields from Harlem to arrange an exchange program of business and community people.

"If we had done this after Crown Heights," said Dear, "maybe we wouldn't have seen Freddy's happening," referring to the violence between blacks and Jews in Brooklyn four years ago.

But even as black and Jewish leaders coalesce for joint damage control, some leaders are pushing to ensure that the anti-Semitic overtones of the Harlem conflagration are not lost in vague denunciations of violence and racism.

Many black leaders have hesitated to label the attack an anti-Semitic crime. Shortly after the fire, Harlem business and community leaders quickly labeled the matter a landlord-tenant dispute that got out of hand.

"Before we have a process of healing, you first have to have an admission of guilt," said Rabbi Marc Schneier, chair of the World Jewish Congress' Commission on Intergroup Relations. "We have to spell it out, and we are awaiting this type of condemnation."

In response to a request by Rabbi Schneier, New York State Sen. David Patterson, who represents Harlem, wrote a letter stating his "abhorrence for the acts of anti-Semitism and bias that have been attributed to escalating the 125th Street tragedy."

The murders were "committed by a madman, whose act was surely anti-Semitic," Patterson wrote.

Not since the Crown Heights riots of 1991 has the Jewish community's introspection on its role in race relations taken on such intensity.

Marvin Schick, a Brooklyn-based consultant on Jewish affairs, called the plethora of black-Jewish dialogue and interaction programs that have sprung up since the riots "worthless," insisting that "in the programmatic sense, there is nothing that can be done to bring people together given the current climate of opinion."

Meanwhile, some leaders have observed that overall Jewish reaction to the Harlem incident has not matched the intensity of other recent events involving violence against Jews.

Recipe of the week

This week, The CJN brings back a popular feature of years past - a weekly recipe column. Please feel free to make requests for a favorite dish - we will try to answer. ENJOY!

Dear Susan,

Our 2-year-old son had his first encounter with peanuts. Unfortunately his introduction to peanut butter was less than a happy experience – terrifying in a word. Within a few minutes of sampling this new food, our son broke into hives, experienced swelling of the mouth, turned ashen and began vomiting violently. We rushed him to a local hospital and were fortunate to get immediate help. The doctor confirmed that our son was allergic to nuts and had experienced an anaphylactic reaction. We are still in a state of shock, and somewhat overwhelmed about the extent of this problem and how it will impact on our son and our family.

Dear Reader,

You must first recognize that this incident was in no way your fault. It is quite proper to introduce your child to new foods as he grows older and you would have had no way of knowing what would transpire. In fact, you are to be commended for your swift and effective response to the situation.

Your son had an anaphylactic reaction, which is an allergy so severe that it can lead to death. Most parents discover their child's severe allergy between the ages of 18 months and three years, when their child is broadening his/her dietary variety. This is a particularly dangerous and accident-prone time for children generally, in that they are increasing their cognitive and motor skills, but still lack the judgement to exercise those skills in a totally safe manner. This lack of judgement extends to food choices and therefore as parents, you must be vigilant in ensuring your child's dietary environment is as risk-free as possible. This includes safeguarding your home and educating relatives and friends as to his condition. Always carry a supply of Epi-Pens, and when at home or travelling, be aware of the closest hospital.

This stage of a child's development is one of exploration and discovery and you must try not to let this episode and the ongoing risks he faces compromise this. It will be natural for him to be "clingy" for a while, and you must allow him to work through this. As a couple, it is also important that the two of you support each other. Overall, you must maintain an atmosphere of calm necessary for your child's physical and emotional growth, while ensuring you take all necessary medical precautions.

You should also know that you are not alone. Information and support is available through allergy and asthma associations. Allergists who specialize in this area will help you develop ongoing lifestyle strategies. Finally, there are groups in your community for parents of children with severe allergies, which will provide information and emotional support. Your greatest challenge is to make the unpredictable as predictable as possible. Knowledge is power – use it well.

'Insidious ethos' said threatening Jewish life

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The emphasis on individualism and personal freedom in Western society is eroding Jewish life and precipitating "a crisis in the Jewish family," says a noted social work educator and author.

Norman Linzer is the Samuel J. and Jean Sable Professor of Jewish Family Social Work at Yeshiva University (YU) Wurzeiler School of Social Work.

He recently gave a lecture sponsored by the Canadian Friends of YU in honor of Samuel and Jean Sable at Congregation Shaarei Shomayim.

The high incidence of assimilation among Jews — the rate of intermarriage in the United States is 52 per cent — can be attributed to personal freedom, said Linzer. "People live with few restrictions ... There has been a de-institutionalization of traditional forms of authority."

The rabbi and the priest used to be in a position of authority and were rarely challenged, he noted. "The institutions of family and religion had coercive power to make you obey ... In the East European shtetlach you did what you were supposed to do. You never questioned. Children were nurtured. They had an identity."

Western value of individualism has taken primacy

In Western society, there is a conflict of values between the needs of the self and a concern for others; and individual rights versus responsibility to the group, he said. "The ethos of western culture is that the needs of the self take primacy over the other."

Such self-absorption devalues family relationships — people devote less time to raising children — and it can lead to marriage breakdown; it can also weaken the individual's sense of responsibility to his or her community, he said.

"The high rate of intermarriage reflects the ethos of self-realization, the lack of concern for the continuity of the Jewish community," he said.

Although Jewish community institutions are promoting continuity and doing outreach, they are failing in their efforts because the cultural values wielded by the greater society has more impact, he said. "It's an uphill battle against an insidious ethos."

While Linzer believes that "the problem is greater than the solution" and there are "no magic solutions," he offered the following suggestion as a first step to fighting assimilation.

"We need to teach families and individuals to consider others' needs before their own ... We have to start with our own families — to meet their needs, then turn to the rest of the Jewish community."

Compensation claim outrage

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A senior Palestinian official angered Israelis last week, when he said Israel should compensate Palestinians for claims arising out of the intifada, just as Jewish survivors of the Holocaust had received reparations from Germany.

The remark prompted Israel's Justice Minister David Libai to cancel a planned meeting last Thursday with his Palestinian counterpart, Freih Abu Medein, who made the remark.

Libai was scheduled to meet with Abu Medein to discuss the planned release of Palestinian prisoners, as part of a series of confidence-building gestures called for under the Israeli-Palestinian accords.

The outrage was sparked by remarks made by Abu Medein in an interview with Israel Radio.

The Palestinian official said he could not understand why Israel was not willing to pay compensation to Palestinians who had been injured by the Israel Defense Force during the seven-year uprising against Israeli rule in the territories, when Israel had accepted German reparations for the victims of the Holocaust.

"While Israel accepts billions of marks from Germany, Israel refuses to give compensation to those people who lost sons or lost their eyes or lost their legs or their hands," he said.

Wicked and vulgar comparison

Earlier in the week, the Israeli government decided that it would not issue blanket compensation to Palestinians seeking damages from intifada-related injuries, though a special committee would be set up to examine what were termed "exceptional cases."

Israeli officials said Wednesday that Prime Minister Shimon Peres had met with the justice and finance ministers to discuss the issue of providing compensation to Palestinians for injuries suffered during the intifada.

Damage suits pending in the Israeli court system that are related to the intifada — the 1987-1993 Palestinian uprising against Israeli rule in the territories — are estimated to total hundreds of millions of dollars.

At Wednesday's meeting, Peres and the ministers reportedly agreed to seek legislation in the Knesset giving Israel blanket immunity to the suits.

The legislation will be included in a bill on implementing the Interim Agreement, the accord signed Sept. 28 in Washington for extending Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank.

Libai said he was shocked by Abu Medein's statements.

"It is wicked and vulgar to compare the Nazis' occupation, which systematically destroyed millions, to the Israeli control over the [West Bank] and Gaza," Libai said.

Chechnya rescue complete

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The effort to rescue Jews from the breakaway Russian republic of Chechnya is in its "last stage," said Chaim Chesler, head of the Jewish Agency for Israel's office in the former Soviet Union.

About 40 Chechen Jews remain in the Jewish Agency's refugee camp in P'atigorsk in the region, Chesler said in a telephone interview last week from Moscow.

Another 100 Chechen Jews are with family members in other former Soviet republics, he said.

"I believe that in the next couple of weeks all of them will leave for Israel," he said of those who fled because of the ongoing war between Russia and Chechnya that began in late 1994.

In 1995, some 200 Chechen Jews went to Israel under the auspices of the Jewish Agency, many of them settling in Ashdod and Ashkelon, Chesler said.

Among the recent arrivals was the oldest immigrant in Israel's history — a 110-year-old Chechen woman.

Tzippora Mataiyeva, who was born in April 1885 in Chechnya, reportedly came to Israel last month with her 74-year-old son.

As the violence in the region continues, Chesler said, he expects the approximately 20 Jewish families remaining in Chechnya will also leave soon.

Chechnya has some of the harshest living conditions in the former Soviet Union, with no running water, gas or electricity, Chesler said.

Women Against Violence

VANCOUVER — A number of local Jewish women's organizations have banded together to form Jewish Women Against Domestic Violence.

The group aims to set up and train people to staff a crisis line for Jewish women who are experiencing violence in the home.

Palestinian Deported

TORONTO — Canada has deported to Sudan a Palestinian charged with being a former terrorist.

Wahid Baroud, 44, was admitted to Canada with his family in 1991. He was arrested in June 1994, after immigration officials discovered that he was a former member of Force 17, a terrorist arm of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

He was considered such a security threat that Canada's solicitor general and minister of citizenship and immigration signed a rarely used security certificate against him.

Issuing the certificate "means that both ministers concur that the person is a security threat and should be removed," said Roger White, a spokesperson for the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

100th Anniversary

TORONTO — The Pretoria Hebrew Congregation in South Africa will be celebrating its 100th anniversary in March 1996.

If you have any pictures or memorabilia that you would like exhibited, or for more information, contact Julian Grabman, community director, P.O. Box 840 Pretoria, 0001 South Africa, 012-344-1551 or fax 012-660-2456.

ISRAEL

Return to Nablus

JERUSALEM — The IDF allowed 40 yeshivah students and worshippers into Joseph's Tomb in Nablus last week, the first time it has been opened to more than a token number of students since the city was handed over to the Palestinians.

The IDF said that until further notice, only 40 people will be allowed into the tomb at a time, and they will be driven there in IDF vehicles.

Amir's Story

JERUSALEM — The family of Yigal Amir, the confessed assassin of Yitzhak Rabin, was reportedly considering selling movie, book and interview rights.

The family views the potential sales as a way to raise funds for the legal defence of Amir, as well as for his brother Hagai, who was also charged in connection with the assassination.

Daylight Saving Time

JERUSALEM — The Knesset Interior Committee has decided that daylight saving time will start on March 14, one month earlier than last year. It will officially end on Sept. 15.

Bone Marrow Test

JERUSALEM — Yavneh Olami, together with the Sue Harris Bone Marrow Campaign held a successful bone marrow drive, testing over 1,500 people.

Harris is a 32-year-old British resident who has been searching for a bone marrow match since she was diagnosed with leukemia over three years ago.

Judaica Prize Announced

JERUSALEM — To commemorate the 3,000 years since King David established Jerusalem as the capital of the Jewish people, 350 artists from around the world will create one-of-a-kind Jewish ceremonial objects for the sixth Jerusalem Judaica Fair.

The fair, which attracts both serious collectors of Judaica and those who simply like to browse, will take place May 5 to 9 at Binyanei Ha'uma, Jerusalem's international convention centre.

Competing for a prize of $25,000, the artists have been asked to create Torah crowns, kiddush cups and Passover seder plates. The objects must incorporate the themes of Jerusalem and King David, and reflect a vision of Judaica in the next millennium.

Memorandum Signed

JERUSALEM — A memorandum of understanding for scientific and technological cooperation between the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Korea Research Institute of Bioscience and Biotechnology was signed recently in Jerusalem by representatives of the two institutions.

The agreement provides for exchange of faculty members and post-doctoral students, short-term projects for technical training, joint study and research activities and exchange of scientific and technical information.

Trade Centre Planned

BERLIN — The recent announcement of the 1997 opening of the Jewish Trade and Communication Centre is another move toward rebuilding what once was a thriving Jewish neighborhood in the eastern part of this city.

The new building, which will house a permanent exhibit on Jewish culture and trade, will be located on Oranienburger Strasse in eastern Berlin's Scheunenviertel, a pre-World War II centre of Jewish culture that has been undergoing a renewal.

Orthodox rabbinate updates Toronto eruv

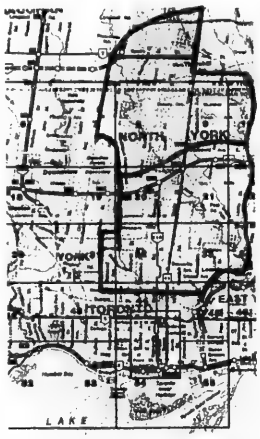
By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto eruv, which allows Jews to carry on the Shabbat, has been updated, according to an announcement by the Vaad Harabonim.

On Shabbat, carrying in the public domain (in the street, for instance) is prohibited according to Jewish law. Indeed, it is one of the major 39 prohibitions of Shabbat, which include lighting a fire and cooking.

Recognizing that not being able to carry in the street could mean considerable constraint in terms of fully enjoying Shabbat (pushing a child to the synagogue in a stroller or carrying a tallit or medicine is not allowed, for instance), "many centuries ago the great rabbis created the concept of an eruv, in which an area was enclosed so that it could legally be considered as a single unit," explained Vaad president Rabbi Moshe Stern.

Rabbi Stern told The CJN that for many years, Toronto has had an eruv, which was under the auspices of the late Rabbi Abraham Price.



The boundaries of the new eruv.

"Many relied on it — indeed, many still do," he said.

However, with the increase both in the Jewish community as a whole, and especially in Torah observance, "it was felt by many that the eruv needed upgrading, so that everyone could feel comfortable [with it]," he said.

The new eruv, made by interconnecting wires and passageways throughout the area of the eruv, covers where 90 per cent of the Jewish population lives.

It goes roughly from a little north of the railway tracks in Thornhill, south to the Dupont tracks, west to Caledonia and east to Leslie. (For the exact boundaries, see the accompanying map.)

"It took a tremendous amount of time [five years], effort and money," Rabbi Stern said, acknowledging the help of Rabbi Henry Hoschander, chair of the Vaad eruv committee; Rabbis Shlomo Miller and Akiva Steinmetz of Kollel Avreichim; Daniel Gordon; Phil Beinhaker; and Manny and Daniel Dienna, as well as the various levels of municipal government, CN and CP railways and North York Hydro.

The new eruv does not include the downtown Jewish community, the University Avenue hospital strip, or the areas east of Leslie or west of Marlee, which were included in the earlier eruv.

"Rabbi Price's eruv extends to the lake," Rabbi Stern noted. "Those who rely on his eruv, will probably continue to do so."

The Vaad hopes, he said, to extend the eruv south to the hospitals in the future.

Twenty-two volunteers, from various local synagogues, have undertaken to monitor the eruv on a regular basis. The major components will be checked every week, and the entire system every month, Rabbi Stern said.

A hotline has been established, so people can verify every Friday that the eruv is indeed intact. The number is 416-350-2879.

The Vaad undertook the process of updating the eruv as a public service, said Rabbi Stern.

"It is the responsibility of the Vaad to enhance and encourage Sabbath observance. It will be a blessing to the entire community," he said.

Establishment of eruv helped curb Shabbat violations

By STEPHEN SPEISMAN
Special to The CJN

Sabbath observance in Toronto was on the decline in the 1920s. It was not that many people would not have preferred to be shomrai Shabbat, but economic considerations militated against it. Most did not have the strength of faith to face the sacrifices that Shabbat observance entailed, and the social pressure of the East European shtetl which made pariahs of Sabbath violators was no longer a factor.

The trend was not surprising. In factories, where a great many immigrant Jews worked, and which were owned primarily by non-Jews, Saturday morning operation was common. As competition for jobs increased, so too did the fear of being fired for Saturday absence. In the retail trades, Saturday was often the principal business day and Sunday opening was not an option because it was illegal.

Consequently, Jewish stores were opening Saturday, not only on major thoroughfares such as Yonge Street, but also in the solidly Jewish Kensington Market. These included groceries and bakeries, formerly the strictest in Sabbath observance.

Local rabbis and observant laymen attempted to stem the tide, organizing a committee to find jobs for Sabbath-observant young people. Rabbi Yehuda Leib Graubart, rav of Toronto's Polish Jews, launched a campaign against Sabbath violators, delivering sermons on Kensington street corners, urging a boycott of offending stores and encouraging picketing of those establishments. He risked being assaulted in the attempt.

By 1927, it was apparent that these efforts had been largely unsuccessful. Rabbi Graubart, concerned for the welfare of the population, then determined to establish an eruv, a rarity in North American cities. This would allow Jews to carry legally within its boundaries, and so not violate this aspect of Shabbat.

Toronto was especially suited to the plan, bounded as it was on three sides by natural boundaries; Lake Ontario to the south, the Don River to the east and the Humber River to the west. All that was needed was to enclose the area in which most Jews lived and worked with a boundary on the north.

This was accomplished by a wire running parallel to Bloor Street between the two rivers.

Because Rabbi Graubart was considered a gadol, a recognized halachic authority, the vast majority of observant Jews and even most other rabbis recognized his eruv.

After Rabbi Graubart's death in the late 1930s, responsibility for the eruv, based on these principles, was assumed by Rabbi Abraham Price, who extended it as the Jewish population spread northward. For a half-century it remained unchallenged because of Rabbi Price's internationally recognized expertise.

It is significant that the eruv was not instituted in Toronto to satisfy the needs of observant Jews alone, or even primarily for them. For them, it was a convenience, even a luxury. However, it was principally for the non-observant that a caring Rabbi Graubart felt it was necessary. To paraphrase him, "at least in this they will not violate Shabbos."

CJN Purim Picture Contest

It's time again for our second annual Purim Picture Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit pictures of the pageantry and the drama of the story of Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one picture from two different contestants in each grade. These "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN Purim issue. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a prize worth $25.00.

How to enter: You may submit as many pictures as you want. However they should not be smaller than 5 by 7 inches. Please paint, draw, or color bright, colorful, evocative pictures. You can draw on any paper you wish, but keep in mind we are looking for pictures which will show bright colors well. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.

Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your pictures to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5:00 pm on Monday, Feb.19, 1996.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful pictures from children all across the country. But only 12 of the pictures will be chosen for publication. The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the picture, and the way the picture tells part of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, Feb. 23, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning pictures will be published in The CJN of Feb. 29, 1996. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

A precious lifeline to dispersed kin

Two years ago, 10 of the world's leading Jewish newspaper figures were invited to Brandeis University to speak at the conference on the North American Jewish Press. The proceedings of the conference were subsequently published by the university.

Gary Rosenblatt, publisher and editor of the Jewish Week of New York, and in my opinion, pre-eminent among all editors of the North American Anglo-Jewish press, took part in the session entitled Key Issues Facing the Jewish Press.

I shall reproduce parts of his remarks. They perceptively describe the situation facing all Jewish newspapers today, including The CJN. In addition, his remarks are both a yardstick by which to measure the pages of The CJN, as well as a beacon towards whose light The CJN is constantly aiming.

"What then, is the role of the weekly Jewish newspaper at a time when interest in Israel is waning, assimilation at home is growing and fewer people are reading newspapers? This is not an academic question. If we don't have people who care about Jewish life, we're out of business. So part of our job is to promote and highlight the vibrancy of Jewish life, in as many forms as possible."

Rosenblatt then suggests some ways for newspapers to promote that "vibrancy."

"To meet the challenge of the next decade, Jewish newspapers will have to continue to change. They will have to do less reporting of news and far more reporting of trends, analyses, opinions and feature stories."

This is a lesson which The CJN too will have to learn better. Our newspaper is sent to press on Monday of each week. Normally, it arrives in the home on Wednesday. Most of the paper is actually completed for printing the previous Friday. That means that the stories and columns are generally written at least one week before they are read. Therefore, to compete with television, radio and the dailies, we must cover the stories which are of special interest to our community, as well as provide a different, more focussed angle to the stories that these media do cover.

Rosenblatt adds another method for promoting communal vibrancy. "One role that Jewish newspapers can, and should, place greater emphasis on is education, for adults as well as children. We have the opportunity, through our pages, to inform about Jewish heritage and history as well as politics and the arts ... There is a need not to neglect the Jewish component of a Jewish newspaper. It's not just about Jews, but about what it means to be Jewish."

The educational possibilities within The CJN's mandate are something that we have attempted to develop and will continue to develop. The centrepiece of our efforts has been the page 9 Perspectives essay, although it has not been nor will it be the limit of our efforts.

Finally, in a sparkling flourish, Rosenblatt summarizes the potential of the Jewish press. "Jewish journalists can play a vital role in setting the agenda for the community, for informing and even inspiring large numbers of caring Jews. We have the responsibility and opportunity to report on complex and emotional issues in as dispassionate a way as possible, and at the same time to write and publish opinion pieces that reflect the passion of conviction from many perspectives."

It is the commitment of The CJN to its readers that it will always take up that responsibility with integrity and care.

In an age when news was obtained only from print or radio, the Jewish newspaper was a precious lifeline of information about a kinfolk dispersed to the far corners of the vast earth. Indeed, many people of my generation can still recall a time when our parents and grandparents carried the Jewish newspaper around with them for most of the day, twice-folded and coddled under their arm. Until it was fully read, it was not put down.

We can also recall a parent or a grandparent poring over every article and column for news of "the old country," reading aloud for the benefit of the rest of the adults sitting nearby, the newspaper spread open on the kitchen table to its full, storied, broadsheet breadth.

Today, print and radio may in fact be the last places people turn to for their news. In the blink of an eye, information now travels by electronic impulse and computer byte into the very heavens of space and back. Even the vast earth has been brought into our living rooms and onto our display terminals.

It therefore may be exceedingly unrealistic and sentimental to hope that The Canadian Jewish News becomes a coddled treasure under the arms of its readers. Nevertheless, it is my aspiration for The Canadian Jewish News that our readers, as their parents and grandparents before them, will look upon the paper as "a precious lifeline of information about a kinfolk dispersed to the far corners of the vast earth."

Worthwhile reading

Beginning today, I will share with readers the titles of articles, essays or books which have found their way across my desk and which, in my opinion, are worthwhile reading.

How to Save American Jews, Jack Wertheimer, Charles S. Liebman, Steven M. Cohen, Commentary, January 1996.

The authors offer an alternative approach to the "wisdom" that is current among American Jewish leaders for ensuring Jewish continuity and survival.

New study group launched

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A small group of men and women are finding their way to a deeper understanding of their Jewish roots, thanks to Yedidei Shabbat, Friends of the Sabbath.

For various reasons, according to spokespersons Allan Shiff and Shelly Fruitman, they are uncomfortable with existing synagogues.

"They are trying to go back to traditional sources, but not in a shul setting."

Yedidei Shabbat is dedicated, a position paper says, "to the celebration of the positive elements of Jewish tradition and to classic Humanistic philosophy."

They meet on Friday nights, once a month, with Eli Rubenstein, spiritual leader of Beth Habonim, as a discussion leader.

The program includes candlelighting, traditional Shabbat prayers, Hebrew melodies, selected English readings and a discussion of the weekly Torah portion.

The group is by no means homogeneous; some want to reinvent traditional prayers, some are insistent on keeping at least major ones like the Shema and Kaddish. Some feel comfortable with a spiritual approach, some are more secular. Some believe in G-d, others see G-d's existence as irrelevant.

But they are all "interested in acquiring information from a liberal point of view about Judaism," says Fruitman.

"Not that the Conservative and Orthodox [theology] is not of great interest," adds Shiff. "We use Rashi and Maimonides as sources often."

While most are familiar with the main stories in the Bible, (their emphasis is on Bible, rather than on later writings) the group discusses the implications of those stories, such as the place of women.

"While some of the Bible seems quite shocking to modern minds, some of it is very progressive," says Shiff. "I can understand how some people spend their whole lives studying it."

It is no accident that Yedidei Shabbat meets on Friday night, as opposed to any other time in the week.

"It makes us sit back and reflect more," Fruitman says.

Shiff calls Shabbat "a time the world stops."

For more information on Yedidei Shabbat, call Allan Shiff, 416-488-0688.

Televangelist apologizes for 'joke'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A popular U.S. televangelist whose weekly program is carried on Vision TV has apologized for a Christmas Eve joke that has been described as "insulting and embarassing" to Jews.

In a letter to Hal Joffe, chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Pastor John Hagee offered his sincere apologies "to you, your organization and the Jewish community of Canada for any and all offensive remarks..."

He promised to make an on-air apology as well.

Pastor Hagee's letter came only days after Vision TV president and CEO Fil Fraser warned the John Hagee Ministries that unless it apologized for the joke and committed to abide by Vision's code of ethics, the show would be pulled off the air.

The remarks that prompted Vision's warning aired during a sermon on the meaning of Christmas, when Pastor Hagee said: "And what do Jews think about Jesus? The family runs down to their department store and dances around a cash register and they sing — 'what a friend we have in Jesus.' "

The joke prompted a letter of complaint by Congress to Vision TV.

"Given the seriousness and potential impact of such anti-Semitic comments by a Christian clergy, which were broadcast on national TV, I would ask you to investigate this matter immediately," Joffe wrote.

Acting that same day, Fraser faxed a letter to the John Hagee Ministries in San Antonio, Tex. stating that the minister's language, even if meant as a joke, is "unacceptable. Even more unacceptable is the way in which the director of the program highlighted the derisive laughter of the audience."

Fraser called for a written apology to the Jewish people of Canada through a letter to Congress; a similar on-air apology; and a commitment to respect Vision's code of ethics.

Failure to do so would lead to the program's cancellation.

Vision had not had any difficulties with Pastor Hagee's show "in recent months," Fraser said, but when asked whether this was the first complaint levelled at the Hagee show, he declined to be specific, saying only that "there may have been previous complaints."

The enforcement provisions of Vision's code of ethics suggests this wasn't Pastor Hagee's first run-in with the network. The code states that a first infraction will lead to a warning to the programming producer, the second would result in a formal warning and "a third infraction will lead to suspension of the program from the broadcast schedule."

In his letter to Joffe, Pastor Hagee pointed out that he has been a strong supporter of Israel and the Jewish people. "I have been give the Humanitarian of the Year Award by the Jewish community in both Houston and Dallas...Our contribution to Hadassah Hospital exceed [$500,000].

"I have had my car windows shot out for being a supporter of Israel, have had our public events threatened by terrorist bombs and have trained over 1,000 American pastors how to conduct A Night to Honor Israel."

Pastor Hagee's apology was welcomed by Congress' vice-chair of community relations, Ellen Cole, who said it appeared Pastor Hagee understood "the impact his anti-Semitic joke had on the audience."

She also lauded both Vision TV and Pastor Hagee for responding so quickly when the community's concerns were pointed out. This shows "how a broadcast policy on discriminatory attitudes, when put to the test, can be a valuable tool," she said.

USY convention draws over 1,000

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Regal Constellation Hotel reverberated with the enthusiasm of 1,000 North American teens at the United Synagogue Youth (USY) international convention held here Dec. 24 to 28.

The 45th annual event — the largest gathering of its kind — brought together high school students from places such as Nome, Alaska; Vancouver, B.C.; Louisville, Ky.; and Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the association of Conservative synagogues, and is composed of 17 regions with over 400 local chapters. Two regions have Canadian chapters: Eastern Canadian region USY (ECRUSY) and Pinwheel, which encompasses western Canada as well as the northwestern United States.

For newly elected international USY president Aryeh Kieffer, 17, of Fort Lauderdale, the experience of spending as much time as possible with his counterparts from across North America was "incomparable."

On a more sober note, concerned by divisions in the Jewish community in the wake of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, Kieffer wants to "at least discuss the possibility of having a North American Jewish youth council with representatives of as many national Jewish youth organizations as [possible]" during his one-year term as president.

With a triple focus of education, social action and fun, the convention included a variety of activities, among them volunteering at Toronto-area relief organizations such as the Scott Mission and the Daily Bread Food Bank.

"It was such a cool feeling, everybody working together and going from nothing to piling up boxes [of food] until they were higher than me," said Torontonian Rebecca Saxe, 16, executive vice-president of ECRUSY.

Underlying convention programming was this year's theme of Derech Eretz (respect for others), which was the subject of several workshops, among them sessions on lashon hora (slanderous talk), social justice and ethical wills.

Students said they were tremendously moved by an Israel-related evening program and by keynote speaker Irene Opdyke, a Polish Catholic who hid 12 Jews during the German occupation of Poland.

Jory Berger, 17, co-president of 65-member chapter Or Chadash in Richmond, B.C., returned home with a renewed sense of Judaism "getting stronger and stronger."

The convention "gives you more spirit and excitement to do new programs," agreed Mira Oreck of Vancouver, president of Pinwheel region.

Although his role as a USY member is over, Boston University student Paul Tritter, who co-chaired the convention with University of Pennsylvania student Jeremy Gordon, said, "There's still a commitment to Judaism. That's what it's all about. There is a future to youth in Conservative Judaism."

Sar-El program heightens Diaspora ties to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Aharon Davidi established a program so that North American volunteers could help farm the Golan Heights in 1982, he thought it would be a one-time effort.

Israel was at war with Lebanon, and crops had been left unattended when able-bodied settlers were called into army reserve service. Davidi, a retired general with a doctorate in geography, was then responsible for the social, educational and youth activities of the Golan settlements.

Some of the 650 American volunteers persuaded him that the fledgling program should be made permanent so that every Jew could have the opportunity to "rebuild Israel."

Today, Sar-El (the Hebrew acronym for Sherut Le'Am, or Service to Israel) has spread to over 20 countries which supply volunteers to all parts of Israel. Canada joined the program about a year after its inception.

Aharon Davidi

Davidi, 69, recently visited Canadian Volunteers for Israel in Toronto and Montreal as part of a three-week North American tour.

Over 52,000 volunteers, the vast majority of whom are Jewish, have been through the Sar-El program, some as many as 36 times, said Davidi in a Toronto interview.

This year, there was a group from Zagreb and another from Belgrade.

Typically, volunteers fly to Israel for three weeks and spend their time at an army base doing jobs such as maintenance or construction. Some volunteers receive placements at hospitals or on archeological digs. Room and board is included, as is touring.

The only cost to participants is airfare, although in the case of the Serbs, that amount represented up to three months' salary, Davidi said.

While Diaspora volunteers leave with a greater understanding of Israel and a sense of having made a contribution, Israeli soldiers benefit from the work ethic modelled by the volunteers, Davidi noted.

"Many of our [young soldiers] learned a lot and also made friends with the volunteers, notwithstanding the age gap [between them and volunteers over age 55]," he said.

While volunteers tend to be clustered in the 55-plus and 17-to-26 age range, there are few in between. One of Davidi's priorities is to reach out to the younger generation. He sees the program as a valuable spiritual exchange and a way of strengthening "the chain of Judaism."

He views his own work in a similar way. Davidi credits his late father, a Russian laborer and fervent Zionist who immigrated to Palestine in the 1920s, with imbuing him with the values which have become integral to Sar-El.

York U grad student wins Fulbright award

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nikki Gershbain, a graduate of Toronto's York University and now a graduate student at the New School for Social Research in New York, has won the $15,000 (US) Fulbright-Molson Companies Scholarship for 1995/96.

Nikki Gershbain

A media release says that Gershbain will be working on a research project entitled Racing the Jew/Erasing the Jew: representation of Jews in New York and Toronto anti-racist movements — a comparative analysis.

"With a particular focus on Jewish women," the release explains, "Gershbain intends to examine ideas of cultural difference and identity within this group."

Gershbain has been active in the Winnipeg and Toronto Jewish communities, especially B'nai Brith and campus and youth organizations. In Toronto, she was a member of the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League. She has published many articles on anti-Semitism and Jewish identity.

The purpose of the Fulbright awards is "to expand research, teaching and study opportunities for Canadian and American faculty and students engaged in the study of Canada, the United States and the relationship between the two countries."

The Canada-U.S. Fulbright Program relies upon private sector support for scholarships and fellowships. The Molson Companies' Scholarship contribution to the program has been awarded to Canadian graduate students in a variety of fields since 1992.

Feminist weekend planned

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Response to a Jewish feminist weekend conference held here almost three years ago was so great that organizers have planned a second one, to be held January 19 to 21 at the downtown Colony Hotel.

From Memory to Transformation: Jewish Women's Voices will be geared to exploring past and present experiences of Jewish women.

The first event, held in February 1993 at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, attracted almost 500 participants of varied ages and backgrounds.

Discovering "how women's lives have changed through time and how women have in turn transformed the world around them" will be the focus of the upcoming weekend, according to a recent media release.

Keynote speakers will be Norma Baumel Joseph, Montreal professor and activist for Jewish women's rights issues, on History and Herstory — Gendered Memories; and New York-based writer/ activist Melanie Kaye-Kantrowitz, on Jewish Women and Social Justice.

The weekend will include a Friday evening Shabbat celebration with Rabbi/Cantor Elizabeth Bolton, a Saturday morning feminist service with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and Cantor Phyllis Greenberg, a Saturday evening musical/theatrical performance and a Jewish feminist art exhibit.

Participants will be able to choose four out of almost 50 workshops and panels being offered. Jewish Life in a Single Parent Household, Daughters of Holocaust Survivors, Moroccan Immigrants in Canada, Lesbians Raising a Jewish Family, Yiddish Alive and Well and Women and Healing are among the choices.

"We put a great deal of care into trying to cover a lot of different areas that one doesn't usually have the chance to discuss in the Jewish community," said Sarah Swartz, one of several organizers of the conference.

Registration is $125. For further information call 416-410-7944 or fax 416-392-3136.

Entrepreneur's venture program has plenty of byte

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Peter Feldman, a young professional, exchanges his talents and time for computers, which are then used for job training to help young people with special learning needs and others who need employment retraining.

The project is part of a barter system founded by Norman Auslander and Norman Ringel called Mitzvah Partnership, which is affiliated with the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

Feldman, founder of Petrah Consulting, a logistics management and systems consulting firm, has created an alternate billing method whereby his clients provide multimedia computers in exchange for Petrah's services.

The idea for the project evolved at a study program Feldman attended at the Jewish Community Centre, where charities were discussed. Feldman contacted Auslander, who persuaded him that a computer venture would be a way of contributing to the community by means other than cash donations.

Feldman, 32, moved from Johannesburg to Toronto in 1990 and established Petrah Consulting the following year. He has degrees in mechanical and industrial engineering. Petrah works with, among other companies, Air Canada, Molson Breweries, Scott's Food Services, Bell Mobility and Beamscope Canada.

Feldman approached his clients for computers and software. The equipment they donated was given to Jewish Vocational Service and the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, which use it to help the unemployed and children with learning disabilities to learn computer skills and increase their opportunities to become self-sufficient members of the community.

Feldman's wife, Debbie Cahan, works with him on the computer projects.

Feldman encourages others to participate in ventures that can generate donations. He says the venture program appeals to some young professionals who do not feel that their charitable donations are wisely used. Those who are able to donate equipment, clothing or services feel they are contributing directly to those in need.

Feldman notes that through Mitzvah Partnership ventures such as the computer project, "the depth of charitable goods and services could exceed a million dollars a year. With cuts in government budgets to our community service programs," he says, "we have a great opportunity to channel some of our intellectual wealth and business momentum to help make a difference with these budget cuts."

Feldman emphasizes that fundraising activities are very important, but venture projects are an alternative and additional method of helping the underprivileged in the community.

"The volunteers receive personal satisfaction and I believe that there is a greater commitment to the project and to the Jewish community." He adds that "when we delivered the computers to the classes where people were training — these were the most advanced generation of computers the agencies had."

Basics of Jewish religion explored

TORONTO — Toronto is the first Canadian community to offer A Taste of Judaism: Are You Curious? — a free, three-lecture series offering an accessible, brief introduction to the basics of the Jewish religion.

The program is sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and the Outreach Department of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, with the help of a grant from the Commission on Reform Jewish Outreach of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Classes will begin on Jan. 14, and will be held at eight different locations in the Greater Toronto area, including Sunday afternoon sessions on the Danforth, Wednesday lunch sessions at the University of Toronto and a variety of other locations on Monday through Thursday evenings.

The consecutive lectures will deal with spirituality (God), values (Torah) and peoplehood (Israel), a media release explains.

"Looking at both ancient and modern sources including the Torah, the classes will touch on a Jewish approach to ethics, rituals and community."

It is hoped that the program will attract "an eclectic mix of interfaith couples, children of intermarriage, Jews with little or no connection to the community and those on a spiritual search which may lead toward Judaism," the release says.

While there is no fee, space is limited and pre-registration is required. Call the Taste of Judaism hotline, 905-764-1329.

For more information, call Karen Paikin, special projects coordinator for Kolel, at 905-709-1900.

Death, engineered

In the vile, craven world occupied by terrorists, retribution usually lurks around some future corner. Last week, Yehiya Ayash, the man responsible for blowing apart more than 50 Israelis, turned that corner. It was a dead end.

Israel is suspected of having wielded the retributive sword. It stands to reason. Indeed, there have been no official denials of involvement from the Israeli government. But given the fact that Ayash died while holding a booby-trapped cellular phone, his death was likely engineered also by someone or some people whom he knew.

Thus, while we understand the need for Yasser Arafat's public remonstrations against Israel, we will not take them too seriously. He knows as well as anyone on the scene that the main threats to him personally and to the cause of Palestinian self-rule are the Hamas terrorists, whose chief hero and role model was the late Yehiya Ayash.

As reported in the local media, Hamas leaders warned that attacks against Israel would resume, and that holy war (jihad) was the only option. "The highest revenge against this action is strong bombings of buses." If the reports are true, then Arafat has cause to worry – both for himself and for the self-rule which is now within sight.

Although the PLO has been negotiating with Hamas for weeks about the latter's involvement in the elections, the hodgepodge of official candidates does not include anyone from the "political wing" of Hamas. It is conceivable they may now try to sabotage the elections.

Electioneering and campaigning are in full bloom; preparations are nearly complete for the first ever Palestinian elections slated for Jan. 20. Jimmy Carter and his large international team of election observers will be arriving within a week. A disruption of the elections would be a national calamity for the Palestinians. And if the disruption is carried out in the form of more murderous bombings in Israel, it will also be a national disaster for the Israelis.

Arafat had better take appropriate pre-emptive measures to avert this appalling possibility.

Anti-Semitic misogyny

Before Chanukah, at least one Toronto Judaica store was selling key chains bearing the words "Jewish American Princess" and depicting a little crown. It's likely they were the product of an attempt to be humorous, but the result was offensive and the items were removed from store shelves following a customer complaint.

Although our sensitivity to the power of words has been heightened in the wake of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, negative stereotyping of Jewish women is stubbornly persistent.

Ironically, it's often Jewish women who tarnish their own images by perpetuating such stereotypes. Reactions to the key chain by Jewish women included comments like, "I know someone I could give it to as an insult." What the speaker may not realize is that the designation Jewish American Princess demeans all Jewish women, just as the expression "to jew someone down" is insulting to all Jews, not only moneylenders of old.

The term Jewish American Princess (JAP for short), denoting a spoiled, materialistic, young Jewish woman, has entered mainstream vocabulary. Even some young day school students use "JAP" or "jappy" as a playground insult. One youngster called her playmate a JAP, but had no idea what the letters stood for.

It's time we stopped using words which impugn our personal and community integrity by promoting misogynistic and anti-Semitic thinking, however mild or subtle – even innocent – those words appear.

And they're not always mild. At Cornell University a number of years ago, "Slap a JAP" became the slogan for a student-run contest.

On a larger scale, the JAP stereotype may well be one cause of increased intermarriage in North America. The stereotype has infiltrated the subconscious of Jewish males, said Letty Cottin Pogrebin, a founding editor of Ms. magazine, when she spoke in Toronto last March. Accordingly, a young Jewish man described Jewish women as "all princesses and very demanding" in Susan Weidman Schneider's book Jewish and Female. His mindset represents a serious challenge in the struggle to ensure Jewish continuity.

Watching our language is a simple first step in responding to community issues.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

On Jan.11, 1899, Ahavith Achim Synagogue on Carleton Street in Saint John was consecrated by the Rev. Dr. A. H. Nieto of the Shearith Israel Synagogue of New York. It was the first synagogue in New Brunswick. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Asks Beth Din to punish Rabin killer

There is only one punishment that the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin will feel in his hearts of hearts, and that is punishment meted out by Jewish religious rabbinical authorities. The punishment of excommunication — being cut off from the Jewish people forever and being cast off as an abomination to his people — is the only punishment that he could possibly understand.

To remove the right from this merciless murderer to wear a kippah or anything else that could identify him as being a Jew would be a fitting punishment and a possible deterrent to other fanatics who might be contemplating similar heinous deeds.

I call upon the Beth Din to institute these proceedings as this is the only authority that can deliver onesh (punishment) to remotely requite this murderous act. The assassin recognizes only rabbinical authority and therefore punishment of excommunication must be meted out by august rabbinical authorities in Israel.

Don't rush to judgment on Mulroney

In his otherwise fine article on Hannah Senesh (CJN, Dec. 14) with implications of "post-Zionism," Gary Levine compared former U.S. president Richard Nixon to Brian Mulroney.

Levine did not dwell on the issue. It pained me however to see another knee-jerk reaction to Mulroney's current unpopularity when he is vilified with so little thought. It matters not whether one likes Mulroney or whether or not one considers that he was one of Israel's greatest friends and supporters. What does matter is that Levine has chosen to besmirch Mulroney's name by innuendo when the facts just are not available. Shame on you Mr. Levine for falling into this trap and shame on all of us for permitting the "current analysis" to assume the guise of truth.

Tone down the rhetoric

In the aftermath of the tragic events in Israel, I beseech Milton Harris, past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, (CJN, Dec. 7) to tone down the rhetoric. We desperately need words of consolation and national healing that bring our people back together, not words of hate and incitement.

Self Help Against Depression Inc. (SHAD) was established in 1997 and federally incorporated in 1982 as a not-for-profit charitable organization. We have counselled thousands of people with mental health problems and social distress anonymously over the telephone. We are not an emergency hot line.

Focus should be on Jewish needs

Why did you print Richard Cléroux's Ottawa Scene (Nov. 23)? Perhaps Prime Minister Jean Chrétien isn't the only one "asleep at home plate!"

CJN readers need better advice for Jewish community survival than new "neverendum" threats. Help us see through the PQ/BQ's illogical self-centred demands. Lead us out of our catatonic-like state of shock. Help us find the way to obtain precise definitions of Quebec's "distinct society" demands to be able to compare them responsibly with multicultural needs and conditions in Quebec and the rest of Canada; and analyze (forecast) the effects on our Jewish community.

Since 1979, we have known the price of living in a continuing environment of threats and accusations against "les autres," how it continues to shrink our Quebec Jewish community in a subtle form of ethnic cleansing. We really can't afford much more. As a counter measure, show us a productive way to match their chutzpah with some of our own. Yes, give us Jewish community news reviews on Ottawa and Quebec scenes, but please, let's keep the focus on our own needs, and not lend serendipitous support to identifiable opposition.

Holocaust stamp is precedent

As the first Jewish president of the Royal Philatelic Society of Canada, and also a former curator of the collection of the Royal Ontario Museum, I want to comment on the recent isue of Canada's dynamic Holocaust postage stamp.

It was not too long ago that the commemorative postage stamps of Canada could only depict famous dead Canadians; Canadian historic happenings and major current events; accomplishments by Canadian people of science, medicine, religion and other disciplines. Hence the Holocaust stamp indicates a change in policy that shows Canada Post can no longer isolate itself from major happenings outside its borders.

Please allow me to correct one minor item in your fine article, "Stamped into history" (Dec. 14). It states that no living person except the Queen can be pictured on a Canadian stamp. Actually many living people have been pictured on the stamps of Canada. This is permitted provided they are not identified by name.

Perspectives

'Infused with a fiery idealism'

Jan. 15, 1996 marks the 50th anniversary of the death of former Chief Rabbi Dr. Joseph Herman Hertz.

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

The British Chief Rabbinate evolved in the same manner as most other British organs of government — gradually, and sometimes illogically.

Jews were admitted to England, after almost four centuries of exclusion, at about the same time as the first appearance of Jews in North America — during the 1650s. The Sephardim arrived in England first and built their synagogue on Bevis Marks. The Ashkenazim arrived a few years later and built theirs on Duke's Place. Both are names of streets which were adopted as the names of the synagogues. For several years, these two were the only synagogues in the entire British Isles and they stood just 300 metres apart. Each of the congregations remained on the same site, holding regular services continually for over 2½ centuries.

After 1700, more Ashkenazim than Sephardim immigrated to England, and in due course Duke's Place overtook Bevis Marks as the predominant congregation. By the late 18th century, several other Ashkenazi synagogues were established, first in London, then in smaller British cities. But the primacy of Duke's Place was recognized by all of them, and likewise the rulings of its rabbi.

It was 1911 and British Jewry by now numbered 300,000, an almost five-fold increase in 30 years. The newcomers, mainly from Eastern Europe, were totally different from the long-established Anglicized community, a circumstance which rendered it unusually problematic for any leader to minister to both groups simultaneously.

Indeed the chief rabbi, during decades of exponential growth, had not succeeded in gaining the confidence of the new immigrants who now constituted the overwhelming majority. Thus there was the very real danger of the disintegration of Anglo-Jewry's long-established institutions and structures, and it would take truly enlightened leadership to avert such a crisis.

At this juncture, Rabbi Joseph Herman Hertz came upon the British scene. As chief rabbi, he did indeed gain the confidence of the immigrant segment, and it is largely to his credit that the structure of Anglo-Jewry has proved so durable.

Rabbi Hertz was born in 1872 in a small town in Slovakia, then a province of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. His family moved to New York just before his bar mitzvah, and four years later he enrolled in the newly established Jewish Theololgical Seminary of America. His was the first graduating class, comprising only eight students.

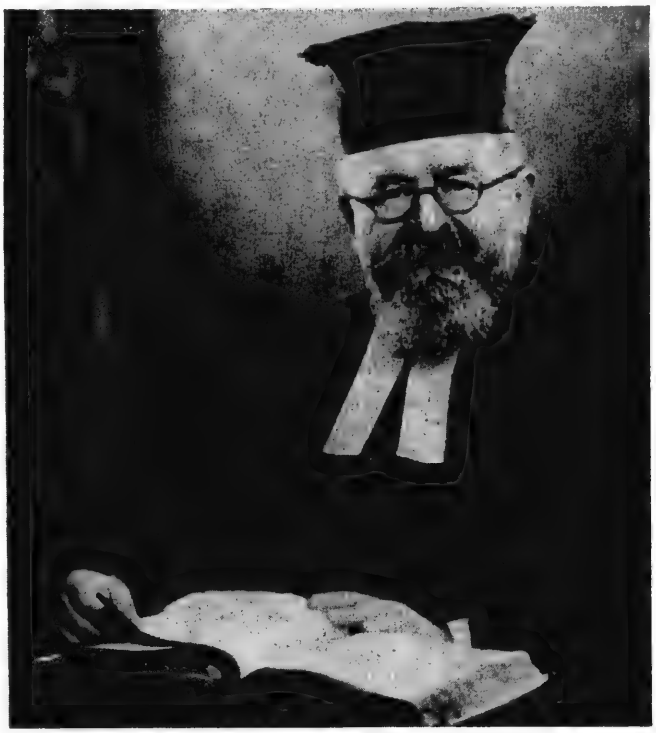
Conservative Judaism was as yet unknown, and in those early years, the Seminary imbued its students with a fighting spirit to defend and promulgate modern Orthodoxy — "historical Judaism" as they often called it then.

Upon graduation at the age of 22, Hertz was appointed rabbi in Syracuse, N.Y. Two years later he was called to a larger syngogue in Johannesburg, Transvaal.

He arrived in South Africa in 1897 at a time of rising tensions which two years later would flare up in the armed conflict known as the Boer War. Rabbi Hertz was appalled at the discrimination he found in Transvaal, which was then an independent Afrikaaner country. Religious minorities, including Jews and other white groups, were severely restricted. Infused with a fiery idealism and endowed with an outstanding talent for oratory, he addressed public gatherings and roused his audiences to such fervor that the government became seriously concerned. So just before the outbreak of war he was deported, a step which brought him widespread fame and acclaim.

The three years of bitter warfare ended with a British victory. Transvaal now came under British rule and Rabbi Hertz returned to his position in Johannesburg, where he remained for 10 more years. In 1911, he became rabbi of Congregation Orach Chaim in New York. That was the year Chief Rabbi Adler died and the search for his successor began.

There were those in England who deemed Rabbi Hertz too Orthodox and too outspoken to be chief rabbi, but the majority of electors voted in his favor. He took up the position in 1913, and again he arrived in a new land on the eve of an all-out war.



The late Chief Rabbi Dr. Joseph Herman Hertz

In his inaugural address as chief rabbi, he defined his function as "the teacher of the Book to the people of the Book." But it turned out that the exigencies of the times called for strong leadership on many fronts beyond the traditional rabbinical field and he met these challenges with forthrightness and rare courage.

World War I broke out on Tisha b'Av 1914. Rabbi Hertz set out energetically to galvanize Anglo-Jewry for the war effort and to provide for the special needs of the tens of thousands of Jewish fighting men. Later he organized relief efforts to ameliorate the condition of the hundreds of thousands of East European Jews displaced and impoverished in the areas of the moving battle fronts.

The land of his birth and childhood was now Britain's enemy, but that in no way detracted from Rabbi Hertz's fervor on Britain's behalf. For the men in the armed forces, he wrote his Book of Jewish Thoughts, a compendium of 250 gems of inspiration taken from his own sermons and from numerous other sources. It was a 350-page book, but a special edition was printed in a size measured to fit the pocket of British military uniforms. The work proved to be a best-seller in all English-speaking countries, selling hundreds of thousands of copies, more than any previous Judaica book in any language other than Hebrew and Yiddish.

In 1917, the British government considered the pros and cons of a proclamation for the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. This did indeed come to fruition, and is now called the Balfour Declaration.

When the declaration was finally issued, Balfour addressed it to the second Lord Rothschild. But it was the chief rabbi who had been the most vocal and influential in neutralizing the anti-Zionist and anti-declaration position of Britain's Jewish lay establishment.

Rothschild, Chaim Weitzmann and Nachman Sokolow, the supporters of Jewish nationalism, were outnumbered by the many leaders who opposed it. The opposition was further reinforced by the like-minded majority of French Jewish lay leaders. In the British cabinet, Secretary of State for India Edwin Montagu, scion of an aristocratic Jewish family, vigorously campaigned against the declaration from within the government, while other lay leaders worked against it from outside. But Rabbi Hertz, Weitzmann and Sokolow swayed the Jewish masses and convinced the government that, beyond the Anglicized establishment, most Jews were pro-Zionist.

Before making a final decision, the government submitted the question and the proposed draft to Weitzmann, Sokolow and seven Anglo-Jewish leaders. Of the seven, one response was neutral, Montagu and three others opposed the whole idea and Rabbi Hertz and Rothschild were strongly in favor. Rabbi Hertz suggested some changes in wording; for example, the original draft spoke of "the Jewish race," and Rabbi Hertz preferred "Jewish people." The government decided in favor of the declaration, as everyone knows, and they adjusted the wording to incorporate Rabbi Hertz's recommendations.

If either Rothschild or Rabbi Hertz had been opposed, or had assumed office five years later, it is highly unlikely that the declaration would ever have seen the light of day. It is intriguing to conjecture whether, in that case, there would today be a Medinat Yisrael.

The following month, on Chanukah, the British army under Allenby captured Jerusalem. The occasion was marked in London by a special thanksgiving service. The chief rabbi delivered an address which today, in retrospect, has the earmarks of uncanny foresight to a future of unimagined historic developments in Judea, which would flow from the events of those past few weeks.

Rabbi Hertz was the first chief rabbi to sever the umbilical tie to the Great Synagogue. He was also the first to tour his far-flung congregations in the Commonwealth, especially in the Southern Hemisphere. In the inter-war years he produced his monumental work, which now is known as the Hertz Chumash (Pentateuch). It immediately became the standard Chumash throughout Britain and its domain. His commentary manifests exceptional erudition and draws from numerous sources. Indeed there were those who sharply criticized the work for citing non-Jewish Bible scholars in addition to the many Jewish works.

It has to be remembered, however, that in his era, far more than today, Judaism was under severe intellectual attack, especially Orthodoxy. Rabbi Hertz was often referred to as "defender of the faith," and his works undoubtedly played a major part in stemming the trends towards Reform, assimilation and atheism. A collection of his speeches and written articles was published in three volumes in 1938.

In the 1930s, the menace of Nazi power raised the spectre of Jewish suffering on a scale previously unknown in modern times. Rabbi Hertz set in motion every conceivable line of action on the political and financial fronts, although the potential for influencing the course of events was severely limited. Together with his son-in-law, Rabbi Solomon Schonfeld, he established the Chief Rabbi's Emergency Council, which undertook several avenues of relief work before, during and after the war, and which succeeded in saving the lives of many potential victims. During World War II itself, he again directed his energies to the needs of war with the same vigor as in the previous war. His speeches and writing significantly raised morale among both civilians and the men in uniform.

Just before the war Rabbi Hertz found himself in the unfortunate position of denouncing not only the Germans, but also the British. He took aim at their policies in Palestine, and particularly the White Paper of 1939. Now that he was attacking their own government, the lay leadership sought to bar him from "bringing political issues into the synagogue."

With characteristic fearlessness he defied their admonitions and circulated to rabbis throughout the land his request that in their sermons they should strongly condemn the White Paper and the government's restrictions on the entry of Jews to Palestine.

Rabbi Hertz's last major work was his Siddur, with translation and commentary. The style is comparable to that of his Chumash and it bears a slight resemblance to the Hirsch Siddur of the previous century. The first edition appeared in 1941 in two volumes. The second edition, in one volume, appeared in 1946, a few months after Rabbi Hertz's death. He himself had done all the proofreading up to and including page 1064, as stated in the Siddur itself. Page 1064 contains the Hebrew of Viduy Sh'chiv Mara, Confession on a Death-Bed, and nothing else. The correction of that page closed his inspiring rabbinical leadership of 52 years.

Rabbi Jakobovits is the principal of general studies at Eitz Chaim Schools of Toronto.

Opinions

Examining the PLO's covenant

Those "clauses" calling for Israel's destruction — remove them from your PLO "National Covenant!" This was an Israeli demand in the 1993 Oslo accord, hardly unreasonable in an agreement of mutual recognition.

By Emil Fackenheim

Yasser Arafat promised, but no removal took place; instead, in Charles Krauthammer's colorful expression, the PLO chief "sold the same rug" a second time, in Oslo 2 of 1995. But this time, to make sure there would be no third "sale," Yitzhak Rabin insisted on a deadline; and, following Rabin's tragic death, Shimon Peres lost no time in reaffirming it. If those "clauses" were not removed by March 1996, he declared, "the train" of the peace process would "stop."

With March 1996 not far away, this is a good time, even high time, for scrutinizing the document; and it would help the reader if it were published in full in these pages.

Of the 33 articles, numbers 7, 8 and 9 call for Israel's violent destruction directly, but at least 11 others do so indirectly, some by delegitimizing the Jewish state, others by calling for actions that presuppose its destruction. Extreme is the claim that, unlike Palestinians, Jews are not a "people with an independent personality," hence without right to statehood anywhere. (Article 20, also 6) More extreme still is Article 14, and in this, Israel is not even mentioned: the unmentioned Jewish state is a threat not only to the "destiny" of the whole "Arab nation," but — no less! — to "their very existence." Remove anti-Israel "clauses"? Required is a major operation.

The core of the truncated remnant are articles 1 to 5, which make two main points: (i) the "homeland" belonging to Palestinian Arabs is all of Palestine, that is, as it was during the British Mandate; (ii) the following is crucial, and needs quoting: "The Palestinian personality is an innate, persistent characteristic that does not disappear, and it is transferred from fathers to sons."

What if, by now or at some future time, all Palestinians had emigrated or were refugees from the land? It would still belong to them and their male descendants — the whole land, only to them and forever. And to a Jewish state? Not an inch of the land, not ever. This the covenant would say, even if all references to Israel were removed.

The anti-Israel "clauses" that need removing, then, clearly include articles 1 to 5 also; and since, without these, over and above those already mentioned, the rest is nothing, their removal would be tantamount to the abrogation of the covenant as a whole.

But here is a snag: according to Article 33, a two-thirds majority of all PLO National Council members may amend the covenant; but can even such a majority abrogate it? Of this the article says nothing, and it would be rash to assume that this is an oversight. The PLO ideologues crafted the document carefully, word for word, in 1964, and scrutinized it again when they altered it a bit, in 1968. And as recently as in 1993, a leading PLO member called the covenant his "bible."

With the abrogation of the covenant apparently ruled out, is there an amendment that, after all, might satisfy Israel? For its "left" there ought to be. Viewing as it does the Zionist-Palestinian conflict as tragic, between two rights equally valid, it affirms a "just Zionism" that both makes its claim to the land and renounces it in part. The amendment of the covenant thus called for its obvious: PLO reciprocity, that is, another, perhaps final article that recognizes a Zionist right to the land as no less valid than that made by the document in behalf of Palestinians. (This new article — say, number 34 — would, of course, revolutionize the whole covenant, but what is this but recognition in thought of what the Oslo accord is, or is said to be, in political life?)

This amendment of the covenant should be the demand, if not of the "pragmatists" who signed the Oslo accord, of the ideological purists on the left who support it. Indeed, they should have confronted with it, directly their PLO counterpart and indirectly their own government, virtually from the day of the Washington handshake. Their purism was gravely compromised when instead, wasting two precious years, they confronted their domestic opponents.

But has it been a waste? For Israeli "pragmatists" (to say nothing of "post-Zionists"), ideology matters little; and but recently Arafat himself asked a Peace Now group why they thought the covenant important. What they said in response the papers did not report. They should have replied the following:

"We must take the covenant seriously because — reluctant, unwilling or unable as you seem to be to make the needed change — you take it seriously. Is the covenant important? A century from now they will know. If your amended covenant recognizes Zionism now, anti-Zionism, even anti-Semitism, may by then have withered away. But if, except for cosmetic changes, the document remains unamended, then your descendants may say to mine, even at a shared centennial celebration of the accord: 'We coexist in this country, even celebrate our friendship. But only we have a right to be here: you don't.' "

Religious Zionism must change

Although I am a religious Zionist and believe that the rebirth of the Jewish state is vitally important for the future of modern Judaism, I nevertheless take serious issue with the direction taken by religious Zionism over the past 30 years.

By David Hartman

I believe that it must change its priorities and outlook if it is to play a vital role in shaping the future of Israeli society. Religious parties in Israel have relied on legislation to influence the Israeli Jewish population. The state must have a Jewish character and therefore, they claim, the power of the Knesset may be used to maintain the Jewishness of Israeli society. They have created and passed legislation related to family status and kashrut and have made the Orthodox rabbinate into the only legitimate voice of Judaism by giving it exclusive control over marriage and divorce. Religious Zionism accepted these parameters as the necessary and justifiable means for sustaining the Jewish character of Israeli society and for preventing its turning into yet another secular, materialistic state.

The fact is, however, that the use of legislative power to instil the Judaic spirit within this society has been a total failure. If anything, it has alienated Jews from Judaism and has reinforced the stereotype of religion as a callous, self-serving, coercive force, oblivious to human rights and the value of freedom of conscience.

The laws of the state shape the external framework in which people live. Yiddishkeit, however, must grow and develop within the human soul. Without personal identification and respect, no amount of legislation and enforcement can affect how Jews think and feel about God and Judaism. The internal world of Jewish consciousness remains untouched by legal and political coercion.

Students who meet with alienated Jewish youth at the Kotel and invite them to their homes for Shabbat have done more for Judaism than all the religious legislation passed by the Knesset.

Knesset members and government officials are not modern prophets or theologians capable of capturing the hearts and minds of Israelis. In the final analysis, coalition agreements and political power have been most effective in driving serious Jews away from their heritage.

The rabbinate too must undergo a major transformation in order to become vital and significant in Israeli society. It is not enough for rabbis to issue legal pronouncements on normative Jewish practice. It is futile to quote authoritative halachic texts in order to promote an interest in Judaism in Israeli society. You cannot use legal coercive language to influence people if they do not share your authoritative premises and presuppositions. You cannot argue by quoting Leviticus on the issue of homosexuality, if Leviticus is not recognized as a binding normative text.

The rabbinate must not rely on authoritative power and begin to act as genuine educators act, by participating in the discussion about the nature of Israeli life as a voice and not as the only voice. Religious Zionism must develop a leadership prepared to discard the mantle of authority and present persuasive arguments and compelling moral reasons to convince Israelis that the Judaic tradition has something important to say. Religious leaders must realize that their influence as educators will only increase as their use of coercive legislative power decreases.

To succeed, they must win in the marketplace of ideas. They cannot address Israelis as lost souls or as children. There is a vibrant, liberal humanistic culture in Israel. If you believe that this culture lacks Jewish depth, then present convincing reasons to support your views. If you believe that the concept of holiness is vital for creating a meaningful way of life, then create living examples to convince others to consider seriously your way of life. If you believe in the value of religious worship, then offer an understanding of God that will inspire people to begin a spiritual quest.

In a word, the future of religious Zionism depends on our separating religion from politics. We must give up the monopoly of Orthodox Judaism and allow Torah to thrive by competing openly and freely in the marketplace of ideas and ideologies.

Historical tidbits

The end of 1995 and the beginning of a new civil year, is a good time to look back not only on the history of the past 12 months but on other events which happened in earlier days.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

For quite some time there has been speculation as to just where Mattathias, Judah Maccabee and his brothers were buried, and the recent discovery of a cave near Modi'in seemed to point at the solution of the puzzle. But when it was excavated, archeologists agreed that this was after all not the place.

Perhaps the truth lies altogether elsewhere, in a little Arab village called May'dah where French archeologists 100 years ago claimed to have found the burial site. They laid bare some magnificent collections of stones that seemed to have been used as the foundations for the pyramid-like monuments that stood over the graves. Unfortunately, the expedition was interrupted, and when finally the French were able to return, they found that the stones they had uncovered earlier had been carted away by the local population and are today — somewhere — built into the streets and buildings of Ramllah and Lod.

Every Jew is deeply offended by the very existence of a movement that tries to deny that the Holocaust ever occurred. In an article published in the National Jewish Post, Prof. Deborah Lipstadt who is the author of a book entitled, Denying the Holocaust, recalls a letter she received after her book was published:

"During the 1958-1959 season there appeared on television a drama later made into the movie Judgment at Nuremberg. From time to time there was a momentary silence which was not part of the drama, but — so many of us supposed — was a temporary audio failure.

"And then, a day or so later, we had the explanation. Our local utility company was a co-sponsor of the production, and some official there believed that the references to gas chambers would give gas a bad name. He therefore ordered all such references bleeped out."

So instead of "denying the Holocaust" we have "denying the use of gas."

I recently read that the manuscript of the most famous World War I novel sold for more than $400,000 at an auction. The author was Erich Maria Remarque whose manuscript of All Quiet on the Western Front fetched this enormous price.

Remarque had joined the German forces at the age of 18. It took him 10 years after the end of the war to put his memories on paper. When they were finally published, they appeared first in serial form in a daily newspaper — as was often the case in those days. I was a high school student at the time, and I remember how I could hardly wait to read the next instalment. When the final chapter appeared, the book was a sensation even before its pages had been bound. Other great war novels have made their appearance since then, but none had its impact.

There was also a memoir of war experiences written by Israeli soldiers after the Six Day War. Called in English The Seventh Day, it was a unique testimony to Jewish compassion for all humans — friend and foe alike. Rereading that glimpse into history should be obligatory for our people in Israel and in the Diaspora, as a means of healing the hurt which all of us feel at this time.

The Kirshner File

A master filmmaker with a mission

From the trenches of World War I to the concentration camps of the Holocaust, the 20th century has been one of almost unrelieved gloom.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Marcel Ophuls, the eminent documentary filmmaker, has made it his life's work to record the evil, the indecency, the moral apathy and the deceit which so often have been the common themes of our epoch.

In a career spanning 25 years, Ophuls has dwelled on Nazi war crimes (Hotel Terminus), France's collaboration with Germany (The Sorrow and the Pity) and the Nuremberg trials (The Memory of Justice).

Diverging from World War II, he has explored the turmoil in Ireland (A Sense of Loss) and the disintegration of East Germany and the fall of the Berlin Wall (November Days).

Now, in his latest film, The Troubles We've Seen: A History of Journalism in Wartime, Ophuls casts a wary eye on the conflict in Bosnia.

No one, least of all Ophuls, pretends that he is an objective observer. As one critic has noted, his presence is always readily, even aggressively, apparent.

Ophuls, who was recently in Toronto as the guest of Cinematheque Ontario, agrees that he is an intrusive documentarian.

"Objectivity has a meaning in an exact science," he explained. "As soon as you have to work with your eyes and your ears, the idea of objectivity is not only abstract but wrong. It is used as an excuse for blandness."

True to his forthright philosophy, Ophuls' films, which attempt to prevent the erosion of historical memory, are tart, acerbic, ironic and personal.

Take The Troubles We've Seen, for instance. Replete with the usual horrors of war (burning buildings and people running for cover amid the crackle of gunfire), it is a meditation on the persistence of human cruelty, the phenomenon of media manipulation and the multiplicity of competing "truths."

Ophuls, a German Jew who holds French and American citizenships, had hoped to use the 1991 Gulf War as a backdrop for his newest film. But he could not because his putative sponsor, the BBC, was over-budgeted at that moment.

Eventually, the BBC, as well as others, came up with the funds, and The Troubles We've Seen, with a budget of about $2 million (US), turned out to be his most costly project.

The two-part, four-hour film is pro-Bosnian Muslim. "I'm entirely on their side, no doubt of it," he said. "I don't have much sympathy for soldiers who shoot civilians, for ethnic purification, which is a Serb concept and a reality."

At one point in the documentary, a Serb soldier, having asked whether Ophuls is Jewish, claims that Serbs and Jews share a common historical fate. Ophuls does not buy this argument, which he refers to as "the Serbian bullshit line."

Ophuls' bluntness is hardly surprising. Although soft-spoken and personable, he is a prickly character, impatient with cant, prejudice and hypocrisy.

Born in Frankfurt-am-Main in 1927, he was the only child of Max Oppenheimer, a noted movie director, and Hilde Wall, an actress. With Hitler's rise to power in 1933, the family moved to Paris, then to Los Angeles when the Wehrmacht conquered France in 1940.

Ophuls attended Hollywood High School, and when he was 19, he served in a theatrical unit of the U.S. army in Japan. In 1950, having graduated from the University of California in Berkeley, he returned to Paris. "My parents were back in France and I was homesick," he said. "Paris is a beautiful town. Los Angeles is rather bleak."

After studying philosophy at the Sorbonne, Ophuls entered the film business as a director's assistant. Among Ophuls' employers was his father, whose credits include The Exile (with Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.) and The Reckless Moment, starring James Mason.

"He was a very good teacher," he said in praise of Ophuls senior, who died in 1957.

Improbably, Ophuls' first foray into directing was in 1964 with a comedy, Banana Peel, featuring Jean-Paul Belmondo and Jeanne Moreau. As luck would have it, his next movie, an action quickie, fizzled, and Ophuls tried his hand at documentary filmmaking on the French television network.

This led, in 1970, to The Sorrow and the Pity, his most commercially successful film to date. A pitiless probe of the conduct of the French people under the German occupation, it was banned by French TV but exhibited in theatres all over France to much acclaim.

Three years later, following the appearance of A Sense of Loss, Ophuls completed The Memory of Justice, an examination of the distinctions between law and justice from the Nuremberg trials to the Vietnam war.

In purely personal terms, it was a catastrophe, as Ophuls and his backers found themselves in sharp disagreement over the film's style and shape. When the dust finally settled after a number of law suits, he vowed never to make another documentary.

Bitter and financially broke, he turned to teaching. But within two years, he was back in the business as a producer of documentaries, first at CBS-TV and then at ABC TV.

Returning to Paris, Ophuls made his Oscar-winning documentary, Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie. Neither a biography nor, strictly speaking, a film about the Holocaust, it is instead a vast inquiry into the moral issues that arise from the case of the so-called Butcher of Lyon.

Marcel Ophuls

For Ophuls, Hotel Terminus was a nightmare. "I could feel the enemy — the Nazis — closing in on me," he said obliquely.

Curiously enough, Ophuls has never addressed the Arab-Israeli dispute in any of his films. "I did have one idea, a history of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem," he said. "But nothing came of it."

It could have been an interesting film, he suggested. "The topic takes you back to the British administration (in Palestine), and it involves (David) Ben-Gurion, the PLO and (Anwar al-)Sadat."

Ophuls, who lives in Paris with his German wife, a children's book illustrator who bore him three daughters, typically researches his films to the hilt. "I do my homework."

However, he is not averse to spontaneity. As he put it: "I don't script in advance. I leave a margin for discovery and surprise."

Ophuls, whose favorite films are the Hollywood classics of the 1930s and 1940s, has learned from experience that documentary filmmaking is not a lucrative profession.

"Sometimes, I've had a hard time making ends meet," acknowledged Ophuls, who has supported himself for the past five years with a MacArthur fellowship.

Currently, he is trying to round up money for the third and final segment of The Troubles We've Seen, which has developed into one of his most ambitious projects, or as he likes to say, his "valedictortian film."

Ophuls is not sanguine about the future of the documentary. With a note of resignation, he mused, "The viewing habits today are against documentaries. Yes, I feel like one of the last of the Mohicans. It is a fight."

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

What's wrong with being many and mighty

Rav ve-atsum mimennu, Too mighty and too great for us.

"There arose a new Pharaoh over Egypt who didn't know Joseph, and he said ..., behold the Children of Israel are too many and too mighty for us."

What a remarkable exaggeration, for Egyptians by far outnumbered Hebrews and certainly out-muscled them. What could have been going through the mind of this pharaoh? He uses the argument of the classic anti-Semite, an argument we know all too well.

One commentator, Rabbi Avraham Abish of Frankfurt, urges us to understand the word mimennu differently. Mimennu can mean than us or from us. So Rabbi Abish translates the text, "The Children of Israel have grown many and mighty from us;" that is, he accuses our ancestors of growing strong and rich by preying off the very land and people who were their hosts, the Egyptians.

How often must we hear such nonsense? Only a few years ago, a Quebec industrialist said, "The Jews take up too much space." His words echo those of the pharaoh, who sees the Jews as growing so numerous that they consume the land that "belongs" to him, growing rich on the fat of his land, leaving the average Egyptian in poverty.

It's all nonsense, of course, for the Hebrews could easily respond that they occupied an outlying district, Goshen, far from the centre of Egyptian life, far from its power and its wealth. The Jews of Quebec could respond in the same way, saying that 20 to 25 per cent of our population live below the poverty line.

But should this be our response? Must we fly this fact like a flag of surrender to anti-Semites to prove we don't occupy too much of their land or consume too much of their wealth? If the world's Jew-haters added up the societal losses in productive power and culture when Jews moved away from them, then they would truly feel impoverished. Nevertheless, we have a human right to exist, rich or poor.

This week's Torah portion reminds us that groundless hatred has been with us throughout time, and we Jews must struggle to keep our minds from submitting to its lies about us.

Another commentator, Rabbi Hertz, asks, what is the crime of being rav ve-atsum? Is there something wrong with being many and strong, in and of itself?

We've just passed through the season when so much outside pressure calls Jews to participate in non-Jewish holiday joy. The Christians are many and strong, but the season calls them to goodwill and amity. What complaint can we make against them for that?

Just as pharaoh imagined the threat of the Hebrews, so some Jews imagine that Christian holidays threaten Jewish identity. The Christians' decorations are coming down. We're still Jews, and if we're strong Jews each Shabbat, 52 Shabbats a year, and on High Holy Days, three major festivals, and a few minor ones, no amount of decorations or festivities will move us from our Jewish roots, nor our children.

The Word: Jewish Wisdom Through Time by Noah Ben Shea Random House $35.00

This rich composite of epigrams, quotations, memorable ideas and pithy sayings spans 3,000 years of Jewish wisdom, inspiration and experience.

The author — philosopher, poet and scholar — well known for his best-selling book of tales, Jacob the Baker, has drawn his material from 500 sources including the Bible, rabbinic literature, the Kabbalah, the medieval period, Yiddish folklore, the world of Chassidism and a surprising range of modern writers and thinkers.

Valuable additions to the volume include a biographical index, a time chart of Jewish history and surrounding events (from 2000 BCE to mid 20th century CE) and the selected bibliography of basic texts.

The following selections are typical of the style and variety of this vast resource.

• A king asked a rabbi: "Why is God's name mentioned only in the first five commandments and not in the last five?" The rabbi responded: "Your statue is placed only in places which are clean and not where there is dirt. In this same way, God does not allow His Name to be placed in the commandments that deal with thieves, adulterers, false witnesses and those who covet their neighbor's goods." (Pesikta Rabbati)

• If a Jew breaks his leg, he thanks God he didn't break both legs; if he breaks both legs, he thanks God he didn't break his neck. (Yiddish folk saying)

• There are no atheists on turbulent airplanes. (Erica Jong)

Wisdom, inspiration, experience

• To cheat a gentile is even worse than to cheat a Jew; for in addition to being in violation of moral law, this act brings the religion of Israel into contempt and degrades the name of Israel's God. (Talmud)

• When a poor man eats a chicken, one of them is sick. (Yiddish folk saying)

• Nationalism is an infantile disease. It is the measles of mankind. (Albert Einstein)

• They tried their best to find a place where I was isolated. But all the resources of a superpower cannot isolate a man who hears the voice of freedom, a voice I heard from the very chamber of my soul. (Anatoly B. Scharansky)

• If my theory of relativity is proven successful, Germany will claim me as a German and France will declare that I am a citizen of the world. If my theory should prove to be untrue, then France will say that I am a German and Germany will say that I am a Jew. (Albert Einstein)

• You can tell what God thinks of money by looking at some of the people he gives it to. (Yiddish folk saying)

• Two farmers each claimed to own a particular cow. While one of the farmers pulled at the cow's head and the other yanked at the tail, the cow was milked by a lawyer. (Yiddish folk saying)

• To know the taste of the wine, it is not necessary to drink the whole barrel. (Chaim Nachman Bialik)

• A wise word is not a substitute for a piece of herring. (Sholem Aleichem)

• Do not judge something proved because you have found it written in a book; as a liar will lie with spoken words, a liar will not hesitate to do similarly with the written words. There are many fools who accept a truth as proved only because it is written. (Maimonides)

• Humanity is in the highest degree irrational; so there is no prospect of influencing it by reasonable arguments. (Sigmund Freud)

• When I am finishing a picture, I hold some God-made object up to it — a rock, a flower, the branch of a tree or my hand — as a kind of final test. If the painting stands up beside a thing man cannot make, the painting is authentic. If there's a clash between the two, it is bad art. (Marc Chagall)

Rabbi Menahem ben Solomon ha-Meiri of Perpignan

This is the first of a two-part essay about the life and work of the great scholar ha-Meiri. Next week we shall publish part 2.

By GREGG STERN

Who was Rabbi Menahem ben Solomon ha-Meiri of Perpignan? And why is it commonly thought that his works were lost in the Middle Ages only to be rediscovered in our day?

Guest Voices

Meiri was the pre-eminent scholar of Jewish law in the South of France at the turn of the 13th century. He composed a monumental Talmud commentary, Bet ha-Behirah, as well as other works on Jewish law and custom, and commentaries upon scripture. Around 1300, southern French Jewry — the larger community of which Meiri considered himself a part — could look back on more than 100 years of diversified cultural achievement in Jewish legal scholarship, in the study of Hebrew language and biblical interpretation, in preaching, in polemics and in poetry.

The growth of Jewish philosophic culture in southern France during this period — from a sapling into a great tree — affected all of these fields and contributed to the self-perception of the community. A number of local philosophers had helped to define Jewish culture and to provide it with meaning as a whole. But, more significantly, rabbinic scholars — like Meiri — adopted a philosophic understanding of Judaism and contributed to its elaboration.

Here is how Meiri envisioned his own culture: The great talmudists of the south of France — with its elite group of astronomers, mathematicians, physicians and philosophers — formed a generations-old community that felicitously integrated Jewish and Greco-Arabic learning for a greater understanding and more profound worship of God and the glorification of the Jewish people in the eyes of the nations. Meiri records this commitment to the sciences as a change in orientation that came about as a result of Maimonides' intellectual influence.

"Ever since the Spirit of the Lord spoke with us — with the arrival in [our] land of the books of the master, the Guide of Righteousness [Maimonides] — great and renown scholars of the Torah and all other disciplines have been within our borders, expert in all the orders of the Talmud and the Mishnah, while, at the same time, succeeding with philosophy and its books, investigating its wisdom and its secrets." (Hoshen Mishpat, p. 162)

Maimonides had enlightened southern French Jewry and had invited them to integrate Greco-Arabic learning into their curriculum, which they had done admirably without harm to their talmudic studies. By Meiri's day, four or five generations after the arrival of the Guide of Righteousness, many of the Jews of the south of France had established this broader curriculum as a cultural ideal.

In Meiri's mind, Maimonides' philosophic interpretation of Judaism provided the cultural ideal for southern French Jewry, and Maimonides' codification of Jewish law, Mishneh Torah, provided the literary ideal for Jewish legal writing.

Joseph ibn Kaspi, a southern French biblical commentator a generation younger than Meiri, argued that Talmud study — as practised in his day — was a morass of intellectually unproductive discussions and senseless technical details.

Meiri rejected this extreme contention, but was himself aware that at times, talmudists had strayed from fruitful analyses. In a masterfully innovative fashion, Meiri integrates the sensibilities found in Mishneh Torah into interpretive essays running parallel to the Talmud. Meiri strives to move away from the protracted harmonization and unabridged analysis characteristic of talmudic commentary towards a simplified and systematized reformulation of the major interpretive issues of the talmudic discussion. This goal inspires the name of his work, Bet ha-Behirah, by which he means, "The Collection of Testimonies" — a presentation of talmudic interpretation from which "all types of confusion, discord and dialectic" have been removed.

In the massive work, Meiri harvests medieval interpretation on a talmudic passage and presents it to the reader in a discursive fashion. From its pages one gets a sense of the full range of European talmudic activity over the centuries: in Andalusia, Castile and Catalonia, northern France and Germany, as well as the south of France. Bet ha-Behirah is a monument in the history of medieval Jewish law, whose execution — with great consistency over so many tractates — testifies to the breadth of its author's learning and the strength of his convictions.

'K' is not kosher

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A CJN reader called recently in a panic.

For years, she and her mother had bought and used a dessert mix. It was tasty, easy to make and inexpensive.

Because it was marked with a "K" she believed that it was kosher.

It was not until she read the ingredients that she realized she had been taken in — the mix was made with beef by-products.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is not surprised.

K, he told The CJN in an interview, is "just a letter of the alphabet, with no significance at all. Anyone can put any symbol on their products, and it doesn't hold them to any obligation."

The only way to be sure that what you are buying is actually kosher, is to buy a product with a recognized symbol of rabbinic supervision, such as COR, MK, Star-K, Chof-K or O-U.

Food and household products are no longer just a collection of simple ingredients, Rabbi Levin said.

Even simple products like flour now have additives, such as vitamins and mould inhibitors. There may be anti-oxidants, softeners or free-flow agents that are not required to be listed on the package.

Many products list artificial flavors or colors, without specifying what they are. (The red used in cocktail cherries, for instance, may be made from beetles).

All these additives, while they may be benign, may also be non-kosher. Glycerin, for instance, which is frequently used as a sweetener, emulsifier or preservative, may come from either plant or animal sources.

As well, the rabbi explained, even if a company uses perfectly acceptable ingredients, the products may be made in a refinery that manufacturers both kosher and non-kosher items.

"If kosher meat is cooked in a treif pot, the meat becomes treif," he said.

While the Canadian government has strict labelling laws, Rabbi Levin said, "our concern is for miniscule amounts of non-kosher material, too small to be included on the label, but which may be absorbed into the food."

Manufacturers have realized that kosher certification is a good marketing tool, the rabbi said, so it is to their advantage to apply for and maintain a hechsher.

After applying to the Kashruth Council for certification, a company is required to disclose all ingredients used in the production, including processing aids.

"An investigating rabbi has to be familiar with [manufacturing] techniques. He has to know what to look for and what questions to ask. A company may not necessarily be hiding information — they may not realize that something is important."

As well, the rabbi must be aware of changing technologies and of food laws of different countries, Rabbi Levin says, as he remembers with some humor a trip he made to Bangkok to supervise tuna certification.

Rabbi Levin's message to the concerned reader? Don't take kashruth for granted — pay attention, read labels, always check the hechsher.

U.S. study finds women disaffected from community

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — American Jewish women have become removed from the Jewish world, according to a recent study.

The comprehensive report by the National Commission on American Jewish Women, co-sponsored by Hadassah and Brandeis University's Cohen Centre for Modern Jewish Studies, pinpoints causes of disaffection and includes recommendations for reversing the trend, based on a decade of collected research and a 1994 study of 14 focus groups (a total of 152 women in their 20s, 30s and 40s from a dozen different states).

The study, released in November, concludes that unmarried women are the most negative toward the organized Jewish community, which "does not make them feel comfortable as singles or help them find mates."

For married women, an increasing number of whom continue to work after they have children, the situation is only slightly better. Fifty-five per cent of women said the Jewish community was "either neutral or unsupportive" toward women combining marriage, childbearing and careers.

Because Jewish women lead busy lives, Jewish practices and organizations may appear as burdens rather than factors which can enhance life or make it more meaningful. Providing Jewish settings for everyday activities (such as child care) is a possible solution, the report noted.

Community organizations need to create opportunities for involvement and participation for women with limited time and energy, and to show appreciation for whatever is contributed. Volunteerism in the Jewish community isn't threatened by career involvement, but by "weak Jewish life in all other domains."

Research has shown that "people often do not participate or contribute merely because they are not asked."

The report revealed tremendous ambivalence toward Judaism, particularly among single women. One unmarried entrepreneur said that Jewish women are "superior" to other women but also "garishly materialistic and unappealing."

Another woman said she was turned off by the "fashion show" at Rosh Hashanah services.

A number of women said they were wary of mentioning their religion to new acquaintances. Almost all said they were proud of being Jewish and felt drawn to other Jewish women, but some said they found the organized Jewish community boring or alienating.

Many traced their disaffection to "tedious and uninspiring" Jewish educational experiences. Others were alienated by perceived hostility to interfaith or interracial relationships.

More than a fourth of young American Jewish women are intermarried, a lifestyle associated with minimal formal Jewish affiliation. In Canada, intermarriage statistics from 1991 indicate that 14.8 per cent of all Jews were living in intermarried families.

One can infer that Canadian Jews affiliate more strongly than Americans with the Jewish community, as evidenced also by the higher proportion of households having synagogue membership. According to a 1995 report on the Jewish community of Greater Toronto, 48 per cent of Toronto Jewish households were synagogue members. Other large North American Jewish centres had lower levels of affiliation (Los Angeles, 26 per cent; Chicago, 44 per cent).

Although the issues covered in the American report may differ in degree from Canadian Jewish issues, they differ little, if at all, in kind.

The report included the thoughts of a diverse spectrum of Jewish women — Reform (representing 39 per cent of the American Jewish population), Conservative (35 per cent), Orthodox (six per cent), Jews by choice, secular, single career women, working mothers, stay-at-home mothers and women born outside the United States.

To respond to the diversity, the Jewish community needs to offer "many points of entry for women," the report concluded.

—Excerpts—

Following are condensed excerpts from Voices for Change: Future Directions for American Jewish Women, the report of the National Commission on American Jewish Women.

Current research shows that American Jewish women are best characterized by their diversity. They differ in terms of their Jewish backgrounds and experiences, their lifestyles, family compositions and occupations. They live in different parts of the country. They are young and old; rich and poor; single, divorced, married and widowed. They are homosexual and heterosexual. They are religiously observant, liberal and secular. And on and on.

Research should study the disaffected. What happened that drove individual women from Judaism? What were their negative experiences and how did they interpret them? Do any Jewish religious or cultural longings remain? Answers to such questions may help Jewish leaders design initiatives to draw women back to Judaism, and they may help Jewish organizations find ways to prevent others from dropping out.

Most single Jewish women are not affiliated with synagogues or other Jewish institutions or organizations.

• Jewish women experience ... frustration over their limited time and energy. The vast majority of the women who participated in our study are employed outside the home.

• Many women ... yearn for a sense of warmth and community in Jewish organizational settings.

• They often feel disaffected from the organized Jewish community. Some believe that Jewish organizations are not welcoming of newcomers or "outsiders." Others perceive that Jewish organizations are overly preoccupied with fundraising and insufficiently concerned with community building.

• Jewish women want to make a difference in their home communities. They want their involvement to be immediate and productive.

Documentary to explore life of Sam Bronfman

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An hour-long television documentary on the life and times of the late Sam Bronfman, head of the Seagram company and longtime national president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is nearing completion.

It is scheduled to be shown on the CBC's Witness series, probably in April.

Produced by Vancouver's David Paperny, a former CBC producer who branched out on his own a few years ago — winning an Academy Award nomination along the way — the story takes the viewer from Odessa, where Bronfman was born, to farm life in Wapella, Sask., to Montreal and his amazing business success.

The documentary takes us back to the family's departure from Odessa, with the parents, Yechiel and Mindel, and their four children travelling in steerage.

Among other things, in tracing Bronfman's success, the documentary talks frankly about the prohibition years in the United States.

Paperny wraps up his story with an interview with Israel Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who in 1951 sought Bronfman's help to negotiate an arms deal for Israel.

Peres had heard that Canada wanted $2 million for a supply of surplus arms, but Bronfman got the price knocked down to $1 million.

Israel, of course, didn't have the money. Bronfman, with another former CJC president, Sol Kanee, called a dinner meeting at the Bronfman home in Montreal, and the $1 million was raised.

Paperny's research shows that this was Israel's first attempt as an independent state to buy arms from a foreign country, and Canada was the first country to agree to sell arms to Israel.

Paperny said he got background information from the Michael Marrus book, Mr. Sam, published in 1991. And the Bronfman family, especially Charles and his sister Phyllis Lambert, "were very cooperative," Paperny told The CJN. Many of the photos were supplied by the Jewish Historical Society of Saskatchewan.

On-camera interviews with Charles, Edgar and Edgar Bronfman Jr. are a highlight of the production.

Lubavitch set to open new school

VANCOUVER — Lubavitch B.C. is opening a new supplementary school later this month, according to an announcement from the director of the school, Rabbi Yechiel Baitelman.

The school principal will be Estarisa Laye, who was formerly on the staff of the Department of Vancouver Hebrew Academy.

The new program is intended for school age children from grades 1 to 7, who are not presently getting any formal Jewish education, Rabbi Baitelman says.

The curriculum is planned, he says, "to guide students in basic subject areas and to foster a positive Jewish self-identity," with an emphasis on reading, writing and speaking Hebrew; prayers; Jewish history; Israel; Torah; and Shabbat and holiday customs and traditions.

Classes will be held on Sunday mornings from 9 to 11:30 a.m. and on Thursdays from 4 to 6 p.m., at Lubavitch headquarters at 41st and Oak streets.

Yahrzeit board unveiled

KELOWNA, B.C. — A yahrzeit board was unveiled recently at the Okanagan Jewish Community centre (OJC), in memory of Ida and Saul Kotler, parents of Mel Kotler, a past president and one of the founders of the OJC.

Funds were raised for the board through a memorial fund set up in memory of Saul Kotler.

In other OJC news, close to 100 people attended the annual Chanukah party, which featured games, songs, a community candlelighting service and other activities, including a potluck dinner.

Tougher police response to hate crimes urged by CJC Pacific region

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Police departments across British Columbia should be able to take steps to ensure universal and comprehensive investigation of hate crimes, according to Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region.

Policies and procedures must be established to allow police services to provide a strong response to hate/bias crimes and hate propaganda offences in the province.

Congress says there has also been reluctance to establish separate hate crime reporting forms or to modify existing crime reports.

A statement delivered by Congress regional chair Dr. Michael Elterman at a recent conference on hate/bias crimes, points out that there are 12 municipalities in the province with their own police departments and 55 municipalities with RCMP detachments, "each of which varies significantly in terms of methods for directly handling incidents of hate violence."

Besides participating in the conference, which was sponsored by Concord, a newspaper that covers cultural issues, Congress also met with Inspector Al Grandia of the Vancouver police and Constable Chantal Mills to discuss the issue, and a copy of Elterman's statement was sent to Vancouver police chief Ray Canuel.

Elterman said there is a need to adopt a single, agreed-on model procedures to investigate reports of hate-related incidents. Police chiefs and RCMP commanding officers should adopt "unequivocal policy statements" to provide for effective response to bias crimes, he said.

Elterman said the most effective response requires ongoing input from the community.

Because there is no organized data available to police forces to define or recognize bias crime, a central depository should be established by the B.C. attorney general's department. Information would be analyzed and provided to the law enforcement agencies about crimes where the victims are intentionally selected "by reason of their actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin or sexual orientation."

Congress wants the attorney general to provide an annual report on this information to "an appropriate legislative committee."

Every police department, said Elterman, should adopt a written policy signed by the chief, "to be able to respond to crime motivated by prejudice."

Further, municipalities should establish an integrated hate crime response network, including liaison with local prosecutors and provincial and federal human rights organizations. Special units should be set up in each community to investigate bias crime.

Elterman said hate or bias crimes can have a more devastating effect on a community than other crimes and exacerbate racial, religious or ethnic tensions, "creating potential for escalating violence and turmoil."

A suitable definition of bias crime is needed, CJC said, but only Vancouver has one.

Elterman said he hopes to meet with the B.C. attorney general to discuss the situation further.

SCHOOL'S BENEFACTORS THANKED

A concert was held recently in Kitchener-Waterloo's Jewish community to help raise funds for the area's Jewish day school. At the event the day school unveiled a plaque honoring some of its benefactors who were presented with individual awards. Seen here (from left) Simon Adler presents awards to Stan Budd, Howie Budd, Pamela and Don Bierstock, Violet Brown and Max Norris from Joseph and Company.

"The obligation to gather information is a mission that victims have assigned to us: to collect memories and tears, fragments of fire and sorrow, tales of despair and defiance, and names - above all, names."
~ Elie Wiesel

REMEMBRANCE IS A LINK BETWEEN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE

THE HALL OF MEMORIES of the Holocaust Education & Memorial Centre of Toronto will now be completed with the generous contribution of a donor who wishes to remain anonymous.

In this quiet reflective area, lined with the names of those who perished in the Holocaust, visitors find a place for remembrance, meditation and prayer.

With a limited number of tiles still available, the Centre is offering this opportunity to dedicate a tile in memory of a loved one. Names are inscribed in English, Yiddish or Hebrew.

For more information please call the Centre at (416) 635-2883 ext. 153.

What happened to the goodwill towards Quebec?

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The mood in the rest of the country towards Quebec has suddenly turned nasty. The latest public opinion poll conducted across Canada in early December by Angus Reid Inc. for Southam News and CTV revealed some shocking findings.

Anger has replaced apathy towards Quebec.

The feelings of Canadians changed during the two months after the Oct. 30 referendum. This is as important as it is frightening. The rest of Canada apparently went from "We love you Quebec" to "We don't give a damn anymore, Quebec."

This is just about the worst sort of news from Canadian unity since Lucien Bouchard was brought in to lead the separatist forces midway through the referendum.

Of the 1,506 adult Canadians polled between Dec. 6 and Dec. 13, fully 46 per cent want a tougher stand on Quebec. Only 17 per cent want Canada to try harder. That compares unfavorably with 61 per cent who said immediately after the referendum vote they wanted to try harder — even going as far as making "concessions" to Quebec — to hold Canada together.

Where is the goodwill? Where is the willingness that was so evident among federalists in the final week of the referendum to try one more time to make it work?

On that basis, Ottawa went ahead last month and recognized by law Quebec's distinctiveness, gave the province a veto over future constitutional changes and announced it would transfer control over employment and work training to the provinces.

Not that any of this pleased Lucien Bouchard. Nor was it intended to. Bouchard has his own agenda, and being grateful and agreeable to Ottawa is not part of it.

Separatists don't elect their leaders to cave in to Ottawa and become overnight federalists the first time they are handed a few crumbs by the federal government.

Ottawa's move was aimed at helping the 20 per cent of Quebecers identified as soft federalists, who will need fresh ammunition in 1996 to counter the widespread notion in Quebec that the province always gets short-changed at constitutional talks, that Quebec's true distinct identity is never recognized, let alone appreciated, by the rest of Canada, and that Ottawa forces Quebec workers to submit to so-called national job-training programs that are neither useful nor even respectful of Quebec's particular needs.

The supreme irony revealed in this latest poll is that while the rest of Canada seems to be turning on Quebec, Quebecers still want to keep on trying. Fully 49 per cent of Quebecers said the province should try harder to get along with the rest of Canada and only 28 per cent want a tougher stand.

This dichotomy is reflected in partisan voting intentions as well.

In Quebec, the Liberals and Bloc Québécois remained as they were before the referendum — 42 per cent to 41 per cent respectively — effectively tied if you take into account the poll's margin of error of 2.5 per cent either way.

But in the rest of Canada the Liberals are down to 49 per cent, from the 56 per cent they had just before the referendum. The big winners have been the Reform party with Preston Manning's get-tough on Quebec stand.

The Reform party, which was in free-fall before the referendum, has soared from 11 per cent to 16 per cent in popularity, based largely on impressive gains in Alberta and British Columbia where sock-it-to-Quebec feelings are strongest.

And Jean Charest, who did so much for Canada during the referendum campaign, convincing thousands of French-speaking Quebecers to vote for Canada, has dropped three points in popularity from 14 per cent to 11 per cent.

A grateful nation looks the other way!

It takes both partners to make the Canadian political marriage work. It would be a shame if the great nation came apart because the rest of Canada rejected Quebec at a time when Quebec, having come so close to leaving, was trying to get back in. Now is not the time to turn our backs on Quebec.

Letter shocks survivor

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Whenever Jack Gardner gets up to speak at a meeting — which is frequently — he never fails to remind his audience about the horrors of the Holocaust, which he survived, and how the Nazis wiped out his shtetl on the border of the old Soviet Union and Poland.

So it was with some shock that he heard recently from several people who had received Holocaust denial literature in the mail, in an envelope bearing his name and address in the corner — as if he had sent it.

Inside, with the sheaf of photocopied pages, was a handwritten, unsigned note stating: "After reading this book, which was banned in Canada, I changed my mind. Read it and think!"

The note continues: "In the enclosed writings we bring you irrefutable evidence that the allegations that six million Jews died during World War II as a result of a German policy of extermination is utterly unfounded."

"I don't know who is doing this, using my name," said 80-year-old Gardner, who has often written letters to the editor of the Times-Colonist newspaper on the subject of the Holocaust.

Gardner lives in Oak Bay, a Victoria suburb, and asked the Oak Bay police to investigate, but he was told there was little they could do since no laws were broken and mail is hard to trace.

Gardner said postal regulations do not appear to forbid anyone from using somebody else's name and address, but if it was hate literature, it would be illegal to use the mail to distribute it.

Polish-born Gardner said he finds the whole thing revolting. He was in the Polish army in September 1939, when the Germans and then the Soviet Union invaded. His village was on the Soviet side of his partitioned area and he ended up in the Soviet army when the Germans invaded Russia in 1941. He was wounded near Stalingrad but managed to survive. As the Soviet army began rolling into Germany, Gardner followed until he got to his home village.

His entire family, along with 3,000 other Jews in the village, were dead. "I came back and found everybody killed ... everybody murdered and dumped in mass graves," he said.

Nazi scientist dies

TORONTO — Former Nazi rocket scientist Arthur Rudolph, whose 1990 bid to enter Canada was denied due to his involvement in war crimes, died last week in Germany at age 89.

Rudolph was part of a group of Nazi scientists recruited by the United States in Operation Paperclip to develop military, and later space rockets.

During World War II, he was involved in Nazi rocket programs that used massive numbers of slave laborers, thousands of whom came from the Dora concentration camp and died under his supervision.

In 1982, he signed an agreement renouncing his U.S. citizenship and he later left the country.

In 1990, he entered Canada in what was seen as a first step in a bid to return to the United States. However, an Immigration adjudicator ordered him removed because of his complicity in war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Gymnast runs rings around international opposition

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Justin Gerson is back home now, feeling justifiably proud after more than holding his own in a competition against some of the best young gymnasts the world has to offer.

Gerson, 17, parlayed a first in rings and a third in vault to finish third overall in the Union of West Vienna Cup in Austria.

Athletes from Russia and Hungary snagged the top two places, but Gerson, a member of Vaughan Gymnastics Club, was kvelling at his own showing.

"This was the toughest competition I've ever come against as a junior ... I was really pumped up for it. Everything keyed in on that day," he said.

Gerson excelled in his best event, rings, and his vault result is all the more remarkable considering he broke a bone in his foot one week before the competition.

With his ankle iced down and taped up, and with the benefit of officially-approved painkillers, Gerson managed a third in vault after changing his routine to allow for a slower run-up to the pommel horse.

Justin Gerson

The foot injury seemed to affect him more in the floor exercises, where he finished seventh. His fourth in parallel bars, fifth in high bar and seventh in pommel horse made for a third place finish overall.

Gerson, who was accompanied by his Vaughan coach Bob Carisse, was the only gymnast selected to represent the Great White North by the Canadian Gymnastics Federation. The competition attracted athletes from 30 countries.

Gerson expects his strong showing will improve his standing among junior (under 18) Canadian gymnasts and might earn him a spot on the national team at next summer's Pan American Games in Guatemala.

His showing last May at the Canadian nationals in Vancouver — he finished 10th overall — was a bit of a disappointment. Still, it was good enough to get him on the Canadian national team and earn him consideration for the Vienna meet.

In March, Gerson will pack his bags and head for Montreal for Elite Canada, a top level national competition, while in May, it's over to Sault Ste. Marie for the 1996 nationals.

Gerson said that if all goes well, he hopes to represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1997 and eventually, wear Canada's colors at the 2000 Olympics.

Young athletes do well at provincial qualifying event

TORONTO — Provincial calibre gymnasts have circled several dates on their calendars in April and May as the time when they'll compete in the Ontario championships.

Several young athletes who train at the Vaughan Gymnastics Club recently took part in qualifying events leading up to those provincial championships, the club reported.

Vaughan Gymnastics hosted the Metro West Region First Provincial Qualifier for girls, where several Jewish athletes acquitted themselves well.

In the Pre-novice 1 category for 9-year-olds, Emily Iseman finished fifth overall, while Danielle Wronzberg was 10th in the Pre-novice Regional category.

Among the 12- and 13-year-old Junior 1 athletes, Rebekah Flom, 12, was first in parallel bars but finished in seventh place overall.

In the Senior 3 category, Randi Mintz, 16, finished fourth, while Haley Kerbel, 13, was fifth on uneven bars in the Junior Regional class.

The boys' competition was held at the Shenderey Gymnastics Institute in Newmarket, Ont.

In the Cadet class, Ron Zahavi, 9, was tops in horse, rings and vault, and second in floor, parallel bars and high bar to finish first overall in the Metro West region.

Tamir Silberman, 10, was first in floor exercises and first in rings, but finished third overall in the Argo A division, while Ben Iseman, 12, was fifth overall in the Tyro B category.

'Healing of the Jews is now our major priority'

By STEVE MOCK
Special to The CJN

Anyone who has travelled in Israel will know it as a land of coincidences. To Esther Wachsman, one recent coincidence has been particularly unnerving. Exactly one year before Yitzhak Rabin was shot, "on that very hour, on that very day," the Wachsmans were burying their son, Nachshon, who had been killed by terrorists.

OPINION

While noting the coincidence, Wachsman resists any temptation to draw a swift moral judgment. She sees in it neither cruel irony nor poetic justice. As one who has had to face the greatest horror a parent can imagine, her ability to retain such balance is, I believe, impressive.

She, like anyone, has her own political opinions. But her goal is not to endorse a political ideology. Her message is one that still resonates with all Jews around the world, not simply those on one or another side of a political fence. Her message is one of Jewish unity.

And as far as Jewish unity is concerned, timing is the only coincidence between the national tragedy Israel experienced in 1994 and the one experienced on Nov. 4, 1995.

Wachsman recalls the reaction of Israelis and of world Jewry to her son Nachshon's kidnapping and murder: "Such unity had been unprecedented in modern Jewish history. Nothing remotely like it had happened to the Jewish people since the Six Day War."

The reaction came immediately, as soon as the news of Nachshon's capture had reached the family by way of Israel TV.

"What was going on in our home was incredible. Restaurants were sending us food around the clock ... Anyone who could possibly think of anything to do to show identity with our family did it."

Israel radio began every broadcast day with the words, "Good morning Israel; we are all the Wachsman family." Seventy thousand people went to the Kotel and there were prayer vigils around the world. To date, the Wachsmans have received 16,000 letters of support, and over 100,000 people attended Nachshon's funeral at Mount Herzl.

Wachsman went on television, telling Jewish women around the world to light a third candle at their Shabbat table.

"Many women wrote that they had never lit a candle on Friday night, but they lit one that night for our son," she says.

The chief rabbi of Israel asked people to read three specific Psalms. These were read by every schoolchild, even in the secular school system.

Today, however, she notes that the reaction of Israelis to the murder of Rabin has been very different. "It saddens me to see what has happened since our latest tragedy. To see not solidarity and unity ... but fragmentation, delegitimization of groups, stereotypes of groups within our society, which I find tragic."

Before the assassination, one did not have to look very far to see posters with slogans denouncing Rabin as a traitor and blaming him personally for every fatality since the Oslo accords. Nor did one have to listen carefully to hear religious Jews blamed en masse, often by Israel's political leaders, for right-wing extremism.

Since the murder of Rabin, divisions have become even sharper. Ears and minds have closed more tightly as everyone has searched for someone else to blame. When she was a guest on a special episode of Nightline, Wachsman watched as accusations were traded across political poles and broadcast live around the world.

"Unity does not mean that everyone is the same or that everyone is together on a rational or ideological plane," she says. "Unity does not mean that we all have the same views, opinions or ideologies. Unity of the Jewish people is more of an emotional unity, where we care about each other ... where we respect, legitimize and tolerate each other's differences. We communicate, tolerate and love our fellow Jew."

She feels the slogan "Yes to peace, No to violence" that has emerged since Rabin's assassination implies that those who oppose the current peace process are violent, and now even an accessory to murder. Wachsman says she has heard of people being interrogated by the authorities on suspicion of having said something inciteful.

This state of affairs, in which Israeli society has polarized between often false stereotypes of a religious right and a secular left, is in sharp contrast to the Israel that offered support and comfort to her family one year ago.

"The people who were with us were of all strains of the Jewish people ... religious and secular, Sephardi and Ashkenazi ... Members of Knesset sat next to truck drivers in our living room. [They came] from Metulla to Eilat," Wachsman says.

After the tragedy, her husband shocked the world when he met with the father of the terrorist who killed his son. "My husband did that as a bridge to peace," she says, "to show that a Jewish father and an Arab father could reach a consensus, could communicate and could agree on denouncing terrorism.

"But bridges to peace with our enemies are almost a farce when there is so much enmity amongst ourselves ... The healing of the Jews is now our major priority.

"Nachshon has been called a victim of peace. I don't like that definition. He was a victim of terror. If [Nachshon] was a victim of peace, so were 162 before and after him, up to [Rabin] — he was also a victim of peace."

Palestinian elections a test for democracy

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It is going to be the best show of democracy the Arab world has ever known.

COMMENTARY

But in the best tradition of the Arab Middle East, there will be few surprises in the voting: The results are more or less already known.

On Jan. 20, as many as 1.2 million Palestinians will elect leaders for the first time in their troubled history.

Although the official campaigning began only this week, the political competition has been in the air for the past few weeks.

Contrary to earlier fears, the campaigning has so far proceeded without bloodshed or bitter clashes, as if democracy has always been the name of the Palestinian political game.

In recent weeks, candidates for the Palestinian Council have filled the newspapers with their photos, seeking the support of the voters.

Suddenly, faces from the intifada — the 1987 to 1993 uprising against Israeli administration of the territories — have surfaced from deep underground to announce that they are part of the legitimate political scene.

Some 3,000 international supervisors, led by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, are likely to encounter an election in which the rules of the game are generally played fairly — right down to the computerized ballots that were provided with the compliments of the government of Japan.

But "generally" is a key qualifier, given the fact that international observers to the elections have already criticized PLO leader Yasser Arafat for making moves aimed at stacking the voting in his favor.

Palestinian voters will make two choices on election day.

They will elect candidates to serve on the 88-member Palestinian Council, the legislative body that will represent 16 electoral districts in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

They will also elect the president of the Palestinian Authority, who, in addition to being the 89th member of the council, will have executive authority over the body.

The only challenger to Arafat for the presidency is Samiha Khalil, 72, a social activist from Ramallah who is expected to receive at best several thousand votes in her West Bank hometown.

Unlike elections in the West, the candidates for the Palestinian Council will only nominally run on their own personal merits.

Instead, support for their candidacies will be based largely on backing by Arafat's mainstream Al Fatah establishment or from the support of the large clans — known as hamulas — in each of the 16 districts.

While the candidates for the council will appear on the ballot as individuals, with no party affiliation, Fatah is circulating its own list of recommendations of who should be elected. The list was created as a result of primaries already held.

But Arafat is maintaining strict control over Fatah's lists, down to the last candidate. And in some cases, he has intervened to remove some candidates from the recommended list.

Some candidates who were out of favor declared last week that they would run independently.

But Fatah immediately countered that anyone who did so would no longer be allowed to return to the Fatah ranks.

Meanwhile, Fatah's main opponent, the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement, has decided to stay out of the elections, though it announced that it would not boycott them.

Fatah and Hamas representatives met last week in Cairo in an attempt to reach an agreement on the elections. Although no agreement was reached at the time, the very fact that Hamas said it would not boycott the elections was regarded as yet another victory for Arafat, because it reflected a recognition by his strongest opposition that the elections were legitimate.

In addition, several Hamas members announced in the past few days that they would run as independents.

Those announcements prompted some Hamas leaders to brand them as traitors to the cause. In an apparent bow to those pressures, three of the candidates withdrew their names during the week.

Other Palestinian groups opposed to the peace process have also opted out of the elections, leaving a situation in which the only competition to Fatah will come from Communists and eight other insignificant splinter groups — none of whom are expected to gather a significant portion of the vote.

Arafat's critics say that he and the Fatah leadership are using strong-arm tactics to rule the streets and the polls.

"In Tulkarm, there is no political competition," said candidate Dr. Thabet Thabet. "There are 40 candidates — all Fatah candidates."

One of the more striking phenomena in Fatah's pre-election strategy is the absence of the young leaders of the intifada from the candidate lists.

The youths who had carried the uprising on their shoulders, organizing mass demonstrations and waging stone-throwing wars against the Israelis — and serving prison sentences for their efforts — have suddenly found themselves displaced by older Fatah activists known for their close ties with Arafat's governing establishment.

These frustrated activists will remain in the autonomous areas after the elections — and they may pose a potential threat to the new Palestinian leaders.

Some intifada leaders, such as Hatem Id of the Shuafat refugee camp in Jerusalem, have decided to run as independents.

Id, who served long prison sentences for his involvement in the intifada, won most of the votes in one of the Fatah primaries in eastern Jerusalem.

Israel is well aware that if the Palestinian Council does not give the people a sense of true representation, it will ultimately work against the very interests of the Palestinian autonomy — and of Israel as well.

But Israel has no choice. It must be a bystander as the Palestinian elections proceed.

Israel cracking down on Jewish extremists

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Later this month, Yigal Amir — the confessed killer of Yitzhak Rabin — will go on trial, charged with premeditated murder, illegal possession of arms and conspiracy to establish an underground organization to carry out attacks against Arabs.

In all likelihood, Amir will use the courtroom as a pulpit for his radical right-wing views, which embody an explosive mixture of nationalism and religion.

Amir's trial, which may last as long as several months, coincides with an effort by the Israeli government to crack down on the Jewish extremist movement in the country.

Until now, the government has been preoccupied with Arab terrorism. Scores of Israelis have been killed by Arabs, mainly Islamic fundamentalists, since Israel and the PLO signed the 1993 Declaration of Principles, the framework for Palestinian autonomy in the territories.

Arab terror still remains a threat, despite Israel's withdrawal from six Palestinian towns and 450 villages in the West Bank. But in the wake of Rabin's assassination, Israel has begun to focus more attention on the Jewish radical right, which has repeatedly reared its ugly head since the early 1980s:

•In 1994, Baruch Goldstein massacred 29 Arab worshippers in Hebron. It was the spark that ignited a wave of Arab suicide bombings within Israel.

•In 1982, the government produced a study — the Karp Report — which documented the unlawful activities of Jewish vigilantes in the West Bank. Composed of ultra right-wing settlers, the vigilante groups perpetrated a reign of terror against Palestinian Arabs, largely in response to acts of Arab terrorism.

•In 1983, a Jewish extremist, Yonah Avrushmi, lobbed a grenade into a Peace Now demonstration in Jerusalem, killing Emil Grunzweig.

•In 1984, the Shin Bet — Israel's internal security organization — arrested members of a Jewish underground movement. They had launched a violent attack against a Muslim college in Hebron, had tried to kill three West Bank Arab mayors and had attempted to blow up the Dome of the Rock mosque in East Jerusalem.

Having closed down the Jewish underground, the government turned its gaze once again to the recurring phenomenon of Arab terrorism.

But as internal opposition to the Oslo peace process grew, the problem of Jewish radicalism mushroomed. Jewish extremists and their sympathizers, part of the broader Land of Israel movement, could not reconcile themselves to the prospect of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip being given up to the Palestinians, even in exchange for peace.

Israelis who share this idea fervently believe that the territories, particularly the West Bank, are an inalienable Jewish birthright. As Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook of the Mercaz Harav yeshivah put it during the Six Day War: "The Torah forbids us to surrender even one inch of our liberated land."

This philosophy, which transcends religion, was embraced by such Israeli prominent right-wing figures as Israel Eldad, Uri Greenberg, Moshe Shamir, Geula Cohen, Yuval Ne'man, Rehavam Ze'evi, Rafael Eitan and, last but not least, Ariel Sharon.

All of the above, not to mention Rabbi Meir Kahane, were profoundly influenced by Vladimir Jabotinsky, the father of the Zionist Revisionist movement, who called for a Jewish state on both sides of the Jordan River.

Few would disagree with the thesis that Yigal Amir, an unrepentant extremist, was a child of this ideological ferment.

Indeed, according to scholar Ehud Sprinzak of the Hebrew University, radicals like Amir pushed mainstream nationalists even further to the right of the political spectrum.

In a bid to clamp down on radicals of Amir's ilk, the government has taken a number of steps of late.

•Israel has filed indictments against three leaders of the Zo Artzenu movement, which is charged with making rebellious statements against the government during a campaign of civil disobedience last summer. Moshe Feiglin, its chief spokesperson, continues to claim that the government is illegitimate.

•Israel has declared the nation off-limits to seven American Jews who are associated with the Jewish Defence League and who are considered security risks.

Further measures are expected, running the gamut from detention and surveillance to electronic bugging.

Meanwhile, the courts are sending unmistakable signals that unlawful, seditious behavior will not be tolerated.

Last month, Binyamin Kahane, the leader of the extremist Kahane Chai group, was convicted of sedition after calling for the bombing of an Israeli Arab town. Shortly afterward, Miriam Levinger, the wife of Rabbi Moshe Levinger — an apostle of the far right who himself is in prison — was sentenced to three months in jail for attacking a police officer in Hebron.

Clearly, Israel is getting tough with Jewish extremists.

Calculator helps count calories

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It is a dieter's blessing — or nightmare: a specially programmed calculator that keeps track of the calories you eat.

The pocket-sized Diet Deal calculator was invented by Israeli Yaffa Golan, who said some 130 companies from 35 countries have expressed an interest in marketing the device.

It is preprogrammed with the number of calories found in more than 400 food products and keeps track of cholesterol, sugar and protein levels in the foods.

The user programs his or her daily calorie allowance and then records every item eaten.

The calculator then keeps track of how much more can be eaten that day — and emits a warning beep if the dieter goes beyond the calorie limit.

Security forces go on alert in wake of terrorist's death

Jewish Telegraph Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli security forces went on high alert this week for possible revenge attacks after the killing in Gaza of a Palestinian terrorist long sought by Israel.

Yehiya Ayash, a Hamas activist who topped Israel's most-wanted list for allegedly masterminding a series of suicide bombings that killed scores of Israelis, was killed in an explosion last Friday after he picked up a booby-trapped cellular phone.

To prevent acts of retaliation, Israel imposed an indefinite closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

No group claimed responsibility for the assassination.

Israeli officials would neither confirm nor deny Israel's involvement in Ayash's death.

But Islamic fundamentalist groups put the blame squarely on Israel and vowed to avenge Ayash's murder with attacks against the Jewish state.

Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat also blamed Israel for the assassination, which he called a clear violation of the Israeli-Palestinian accords.

In a speech to thousands of Palestinians Sunday at a village near the West Bank town of Hebron, Arafat referred to Ayash as a martyr who had "died for the cause."

He also said Israel had no right to carry out operations inside Palestinian autonomous areas.

Israel "should not kill and assassinate on Palestinian land the struggler, the martyr Yehiya Ayash," Arafat told the crowd.

Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu said he was worried by the reaction of Palestinian officials to the killing, adding that it provided proof that Arafat was not interested in reconciliation with Israel, nor in taking any measures against Hamas.

The killing came two weeks before Palestinian elections were scheduled to be held and a week after the Palestinian Authority and Hamas had reached a tacit understanding that Hamas would halt terrorist attacks during the campaign period.

"I think that this came at a very delicate time," Ziad Abu Ziad, who is running as in independent candidate in eastern Jerusalem, told Israel Radio. "It will incite people against the peace process and against those who support the peace process."

A number of Israeli Cabinet ministers refused to comment publicly on the killing.

One of those who did, Health Minister Ephraim Sneh, was quoted by the Israeli daily Ha'aretz as saying, "I'm happy he's no longer alive."

Sneh added that he did not think the killing would undermine the peace process with the Palestinians.

Knesset member Hagai Meirom, chair of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, said the timing was right, regardless of who was responsible.

He also stressed that Ayash's murder had not crippled the Hamas movement, adding that Ayash had left behind "a young generation that learned the fundamentals of bomb-making from him."

In the wake of Ayash's death, Mohammed Dif became the most-wanted Hamas activist still at large, according to Ha'aretz.

Dif was said to be responsible for the October 1994 kidnapping and murder of Israeli soldier Cpl. Nachshon Waxman, and for the murder of two other Israeli soldiers.

Ayash, 30, was known as "The Engineer" because of his expertise with explosives.

A graduate of Bir Zeit University in the West Bank town of Ramallah, Ayash was believed to have supplied the explosives used by suicide bombers who killed more than 60 Israelis, mostly civilians, and wounded more than 300 others in a series of attacks during the past two years.

Ayash was also considered highly adept at recruiting people who were willing to carry out the suicide attacks.

Born in the West Bank, Ayash went into hiding after the October 1994 suicide bombing of a bus in Tel Aviv that killed 22 Israelis and wounded 42 others.

Israeli forces believed that he was hiding in the Gaza self-rule area, but Palestinian officials said they did not have any information to back this up.

Ayash successfully eluded Israeli security forces, who for months attempted to locate him.

In September, Yitzhak Rabin reportedly told security officials that Ayash was an obstacle to the peace process and that the activities of the Hamas and Islamic Jihad fundamentalist movements must be stopped.

Hamas sources reportedly said Sunday that Ayash was killed in an apartment hideout located in the Gaza town of Beit Lahiya.

The apartment was owned by Osama Hamad, 27, a Hamas activist who was reportedly Ayash's former college roommate.

When the booby-trapped cellular phone rang last Friday afternoon, Hamad answered and handed the call to Ayash, saying that it was his father.

Hamad said the phone exploded when Ayash told the caller, "I hear you, father."

Palestinian residents in the area reportedly said an Israeli helicopter was flying overhead – which prompted speculation that the phone was detonated from the air.

The cellular phone was reportedly given to Hamad by his uncle, Kamal, who was a suspected collaborator with Israel.

LEADERS CALL FOR MODERATION

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice this week reaffirmed an earlier ruling that local religious councils cannot bar candidates from non-Orthodox denominations solely on the basis of their religious affiliation.

The court ordered last Monday that a Reform and a Conservative Jew must be two of the Haifa City Council's candidates for the city's religious council.

The court also ruled that the city councils of Jerusalem and of the northern community of Kiryat Tivon must reconsider their lists of religious council candidates because of their refusal to approve Reform and Conservative candidates. Rabbi Uri Regev, the director of the Reform Movement's Religious Action Centre who represented the petitioners before the court, said the decision was "another significant defeat" to the "Orthodox monopoly" over religious life in Israel.

In January 1994, the court ruled that candidates for religious councils may not be barred on the basis of their affiliation with non-Orthodox Jewish movements.

The local religious councils, supervised by the Religious Affairs Ministry, have exclusive jurisdiction over marriage, kashrut, burial and other religious matters for all Jews living in Israel. The services provided by the councils are rendered according to Orthodox practice regardless of the affiliation or religious customs of the individual receiving the service.

Forty-five per cent of each religious council is appointed by the local municipal council, with another 45 per cent appointed by the religious affairs minister and 10 per cent by the local rabbinate. The religious councils of Haifa, Kiryat Tivon and Jerusalem had rejected the Reform and Conservative candidates proposed by the Meretz party, prompting the left-wing, secularist movement to petition the court.

Meretz charged that its candidates had been disqualified solely because of their religious affiliation.

In the case of Haifa, the justices said that because all the council members had praised the Meretz candidates on a personal level, they had no choice but to conclude that the candidates were disqualified because of their religious affiliation. The court ordered that the two candidates be appointed to the council.

In the cases involving Jerusalem and Kiryat Tivon, the court ordered the city councils to discuss the qualifications of the Meretz candidates and to vote again on the candidates within two months.

Remarks condemned

Despite his sharp criticism of Abu Medein, Libai met with other Palestinian officials for discussions about releasing Palestinian prisoners.

Among those meeting with Libai was Palestinian Authority planning official, Nabil Sha'ath, who also commented on Abu Medein's controversial remarks.

"The fact that he mentioned Germany in this case is, I know, very sensitive to Israel," Sha'ath told reporters. "In no way are we accusing the Israelis of being Nazis."

The two sides agreed to release some 1,200 Palestinian prisoners next week as a goodwill gesture prior to the Jan. 20 Palestinian elections.

Israel holds an estimated 4,000 Palestinian prisoners in its jails.

Libai said no Palestinians with Israeli blood on their hands would be freed.

Alleged mosque plot prompts move to deport U.S. citizen

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The General Security Service has requested that an American citizen living in Jerusalem be deported on grounds he was involved in a plot to blow up the Al-Aksa Mosque.

David Ben-Ariel, 35, of Ohio, was detained in Jerusalem's Old City last Thursday by the GSS and taken for interrogation. He was released after several hours but his passport was confiscated and he was ordered to report daily to police.

Ben-Ariel and several cohorts who remain at large allegedly planned to blow up Al-Aksa to pave the way for the building of the third temple, security sources said.

Ben-Ariel denied the allegations, and said he was being unfairly treated by the GSS and police.

Sources said they wanted Ben-Ariel deported, and not brought to trial, because they were concerned they lacked hard evidence to convict him.

"It is no secret, and I have written a book about it, that I want Al-Aksa removed and the temple rebuilt," Ben-Ariel said. "But I have no plans to remove it myself. That's the government's job."

Ben-Ariel, a member of the Temple Mount Faithful, which also calls for the removal of Al-Aksa, said he came here about nine months ago, and recently applied for citizenship.

Rescue complete

The agency's next mission in the area will be to "rescue the Jews" of Abkhazia, which declared independence from the Soviet republic of Georgia after a 1993 civil war, he said. Between 800 and 1,000 Jews live there in conditions as bad as those in Chechnya and the political situation "can explode any minute," Chesler added.

Burg tries to contain interview's damage

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, is scrambling to undo damage caused by a published interview in which he said he is poised to leave his post and join the cabinet if Prime Minister Shimon Peres is re-elected in the fall.

Since the interview appeared Dec. 27 in the daily Ha'aretz, Burg has been dogged in the Israeli media by accusations of opportunism and bad faith in taking the Jewish Agency job as a stepping stone.

He assumed the post in June after a hard-fought contest.

His published remarks were said to have demoralized Agency employees already under strain from a budget crisis that has forced wholesale program cuts.

In a telephone interview from Israel last week, Burg said he had earlier in the day reaffirmed his commitment to the Agency in front of 200 senior employees at a seminar in the Negev Desert.

But Burg's language leaves little doubt that he is keeping his options open.

"I don't have any plan to leave the Agency for now. On the contrary," he said in the telephone interview, "I don't see any other alternative attractive enough to take me off the five years I promised" to give to "the Israel-Diaspora relationship."

This "is the single most important mission in my life today," he said. "I'm not going to give it up for political temptation."

The Agency is the principal Israeli recipient of funds raised by Diaspora local federations and the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and is a symbol of the Israeli-Diaspora partnership.

Diaspora leaders of the Agency were clearly dismayed by the Ha'aretz interview, but several said they were not surprised. They sought to downplay the incident and insist that nothing has changed.

"I was not shocked at the substance" of the remarks, "only the way they were delivered," said Shoshana Cardin, chair of the United Israel Appeal, which funnels UJA money to the Agency.

Burg, who resigned from his Labor seat in the Knesset to take the job, made plain his long-term political aspirations when he was first interviewed to head the Agency.

Burg has expressed interest in becoming prime minister of Israel some day.

Indeed, his political stature was seen as an asset by those who supported his candidacy and who argued it would help upgrade the image of the Agency, which had been tarnished by scandals at the top and has been held in low esteem in Israel.

The last Agency chair, Simcha Dinitz, stepped down from his position after being indicted on charges of fraud and abuse of the public trust. A court decision in his trial is pending.

At the time, the job appeared ideal for Burg.

A stormy relationship with Yitzhak Rabin sharply limited his options in the government and made the Agency chair the most attractive quasi-political job he could get, observers agree.

But the Rabin's assassination in November abruptly changed Burg's political fortunes. With his mentor Shimon Peres at the helm of the new government, it was inevitable that Burg would seek to re-enter the political fray.

The Israeli media's response to the Burg interview was harsh.

"Burg launched a major campaign to be appointed chair of the Jewish Agency," wrote Nachum Barnea in the mass-circulation Israeli daily Yediot Achronot.

"He barely warmed up that seat and he already wants to desert," Barnea wrote, adding, "The lightness with which he hops from job to job does not add weight to his career."

Burg said he did not think the Agency was damaged by either the interview or the media reaction to it. "It's been a long time since the chairman of the Jewish Agency has been so debated," he said.

Most settlers would avoid violence: poll

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Eighty-three per cent of Jewish settlers would not consider using lethal weapons to fight a government-ordered evacuation, according to a recent survey.

The survey, sponsored by Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies and the Nablus-based Centre for Palestine Research and Studies, found that eight per cent of settlers answered positively when asked, "Would you consider resisting with force (i.e. use of firearms or other lethal weapons) a government-ordered evacuation of the settlements in Judea and Samaria?" Another nine per cent said they did not know.

According to the poll, two per cent of settlers said they would "justify active confrontation," such as "hitting, use of lethal weapons," against soldiers who came to evacuate settlements, while 14 per cent would justify "passive physical confrontation."

The poll of 511 Jews in 79 settlements was conducted by telephone late last month. The margin of error is 4.5 per cent.

Among the poll's other findings:

- Thirty per cent of respondents said they would be willing to consider leaving their homes in exchange for "reasonable compensation" from the government, while 58 per cent said they would refuse to consider the option.
- Twenty-two per cent believe that within five to 10 years, most settlements will be dismantled, while 20 per cent believe most settlements will be annexed to Israel.
- Thirty-nine per cent of respondents believe a Palestinian state will be established in Judea and Samaria within five to 10 years, while 26 per cent believe the peace process will fail and the IDF will return to exert control over Judea and Samaria.
- Sixteen per cent believe that if a Palestinian state emerges, they would "consider staying on the settlement as a citizen of Israel under Palestinian sovereignty," while 71 per cent said they would not consider this option.
- Seventy-two per cent said they would not consider a "fair business offer" from a Palestinian to buy their home or business, while 15 per cent said they would.

JSR: an engagement every 7½ weeks, just ask Pamela and Alan

The Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) of Toronto celebrated a banner 1995. Couple after couple have been making wedding plans after meeting each other through this unique system which literally takes the "blind" out of "blind dating." The concept is so successful that the JSR is now averaging an engagement everty 7½ weeks. The immediate future looks even brighter! Membership has been rising steadily and with the inception of a new computer system the influx of new members is now being handled with ease.

Since its beginning a little more than 3 years ago the JSR has risen to the challenge of providing an easy opportunity for Jewish singles to meet. Members get to select for themselves who they wish to go out with by reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles. These include photographs, providing members with a clear "picture" of what their potential partners are all about. This system enables members to make informed and quality dating choices, without relying on others to "guess" who might be right for them. Membership is fast approaching the 1,000 member mark in Toronto alone, making JSR the largest Jewish dating service in the city.

Another walk down the aisle on the way

When all is said and done the JSR concept goes even further. Statistics from 1995 show that hundreds of dates were arranged during the year. Since its inception, the JSR has been responsible for 11 marriages and/or engagements. One of the most recent couples to announce their intention to walk down the aisle are Pamela Shulman and Alan Hoffman. Pamela selected Alan from the JSR books back in January 1995. Within a couple of days they spoke on the phone. With Valentine's Day fast approaching they decided that Feb. 14th would be their first date. Alan decided to surprise Pamela with a rose and to his amazement, she had one for him as well. The "connection" was immediate, and the relationship has grown ever since. As their romance blossomed it was only a matter of time before he would propose. It had to be original, and he wanted to be sure she would not expect it until the very second that it happened. For their 6 month anniversary, dinner and the theatre were the evening plans. immediately following dinner, Alan and his family opened their fortune cookies. Unsuspecting Pamela, of course, didn't want hers, so after 25 minutes of procrastination, she finally "ripped" out the fortune without breaking the cookie in half. What awaited Alan's future fiancée was indeed a surprise. "Pamela, will you marry me? Forever yours, Alan", read the inscription. As shock was beginning to set in he got down on one knee and presented her with the ring. Wedding plans are underway

Valentine's Day: Catch the fever

With Valentine's Day around the corner there is no better time to take matters into your own hands and find that someone special to spend February 14th with as Pamela and Alan did a year ago. Most new JSR registrants are dating within one week of joining the service. It is that fast, and that simple!

The JSR office is open 6 days a week, including evening hours and Sundays for your convenience. Whether you're looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, the time is now to register with The Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. Their phone number is 416-398-7068.

Contrary to popular belief, there doesn't have to be a death in the family to start planning a funeral.

We can spare your family the burden of taking care of things when they need to take care of themselves, at a time of intense emotional stress.

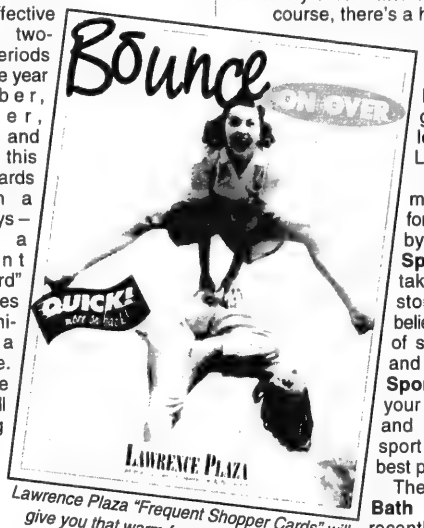
Lawrence Plaza rewards frequent shoppers

The spirit of the '50's is alive and well and living at Lawrence Plaza — an entirely fitting state of affairs for this friendly neighbourhood plaza that in 1954, anchored by Morgan's department store, became Canada's first shopping centre and changed forever the way we shop.

If you're one of the many people who've shopped there since day one or were taken there for a bagel or a nosh by your parents or grandparents — which should include just about everybody — you'll appreciate the Frequent Shopper Program introduced this fall by mall management. Effective during four two-week periods throughout the year (September, November, January, and March), this program rewards shoppers in a variety of ways – using a "Frequent Shopper card" featuring 'fifties scenes reminiscent of a simpler time. The cards are available at all participating retailers, onsite greeters and/or in your mail box Monday Jan. 15. We can't go back to the 'fifties, but, says property manager Sandy Pelletier-Severn, "hopefully our Frequent Shopper Program will give our customers the same warm fuzzy feeling."

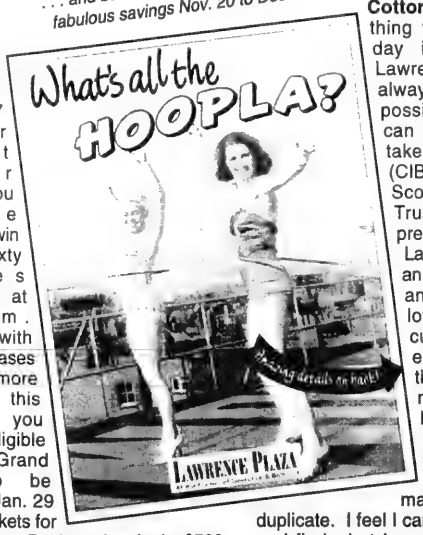


Lawrence Plaza "Frequent Shopper Cards" will give you that warm fuzzy 'fifties feeling . . .

First, merely by being at the plaza Jan. 15 to Jan. 27 with your Frequent Shopper Card, you become eligible to win one of sixty prizes awarded at random. Second, with total purchases of $60 or more during this period, you become eligible for the Grand Prize to be awarded Jan. 29 (theatre tickets for two to Sunset Boulevard). And a $500 shopping spree will also be given away as a year-end Grand Prize in March. Merchants will stamp your card with every $20 purchased.

Third, you can look forward to wonderful values the like of which are not to be found elsewhere. The 1996 version of Lawrence Plaza is a mix of some fabulous "golden oldies" like United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, Kleinberg Jewellery, Roland and Romaine Dance School (where the who's who have trained) and the Regal Bridge Club (where the who's who have played and still do), and an exciting new "concept" store like Prime Time Video, which offers high-tech entertainment in a variety of formats. For clothing, of course, there's a host of choices headlined by Winners; smart shoppers know they can get the best for less at Lawrence Plaza.

. . . and back it up with fun, prizes and fabulous savings Nov. 20 to Dec. 2



Anchoring the mall in the space formerly occupied by The Bay, Sportmart has taken Toronto by storm with its unbelievable selection of sporting goods and leisure wear. Sportmart has all your skiing, skating and other winter sport needs at the best prices in town.

The ever-popular Bath 'N Bedtime, recently doubled in size, now offers you an even greater selection of sheets, towels, and other bed and bath accessories. Phantom Hosiery – Shoppers Drug Mart – Buckstop/Shoprite – Camp Connection – Cotton Ginny – everything you need every day is available at Lawrence Plaza, and always at the lowest possible prices. You can count on it and take it to the bank (CIBC, Bank of Nova Scotia and Canada Trust right on the premises).

Lawrence Plaza has an ample parking lot, and many of its loyal, longtime customers still enjoy walking to the mall from their nearby homes. "It has that friendly neighbourhood feeling," says one, "that other malls just can't duplicate. I feel I can be myself here, and find what I need at my leisure. And the prices are unbeatable."

'Fifties, anyone?

Program aids terminal patients live out lives at home

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not so long ago in a less technological age, death, like birth, was a home-based event.

With the advent of respirators, complex medical apparatus and the attitude that professionals inherently know better than ordinary folk, the dying, like those giving birth, have moved to hospital settings.

Now, some are questioning that process, choosing to pass their last months, weeks or days at home, surrounded by the things and the people that matter to them.

The Jewish Hospice program was established two years ago to help these people. It is a joint effort of Baycrest Centre, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital and Senior Care.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services for JF&CS, calls the program a vehicle to help people "learn to live more meaningful lives after being diagnosed with a terminal illness."

People are happier and more comfortable at home surrounded by family and they have greater privacy than in a hospital, which they see as artificial and intrusive, he said.

Sheila Walker

Rabbi Weiss provides spiritual counselling for patients and their families.

What the dying fear, he told The CJN, is dying alone and dying in pain. "Jewish Hospice addresses both from a Jewish perspective," he said.

The program offers support and counselling not just to the patient, but to the care-givers as well.

Often what is needed is simply listening.

"If people can share their thoughts and feelings before death, they don't have the lingering guilt of things left unsaid," he said.

Requests for assistance come to Sheila Walker, coordinator of the program. She tries to respond immediately if there is a crisis, but she said there is often a great deal of phone contact, sometimes for months.

She assesses each situation and determines what help is needed — counselling, home care services, or just for a few hours away for the care-givers.

She told of dealing with sibling rivalry, of a dying woman being reunited with her estranged mother, of a 30-year-old man so resigned to dying from a brain tumor that he never went out alone until his death three years later.

Support may go on after death, Walker said, helping to plan the funeral and shiva and follow-up telephone calls or visits.

"We are dealing with improving the quality of life. We dwell on living, not on dying," she said.

Mount Sinai Hospital's Dr. Larry Librach offers medical care in the home or in Baycrest's Palliative Care Unit if it proves impossible to keep the patient at home when death is imminent, or medical consultation to a person's own physician.

This includes managing both pain and symptoms, he said. People need not fear dying in pain, as appropriate medication is prescribed and given either by the care-giver or by nursing personnel.

Similarly, assistance is offered with, for instance, changing dressings or tubes or catheters, as well as with such basic needs as bathing and feeding.

Jewish Hospice deals with about 90 cases a year. The ages of those requesting its services reflect what Walker called "the demographics of dying." About 75 per cent are over 50 and an astonishing one-quarter are under 40.

Funding for the program comes from Federation and donations, but community support is badly needed, said Librach.

Gene causes daring behavior

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — People who get a kick out of bungee jumping and skydiving are apparently genetically predisposed to such activities.

Israeli and American researchers have isolated a gene believed to be responsible for 10 per cent of people's adventurous and risk-taking behavior.

The finding was made by doctors at the Soroka Hospital in Beersheba, the Beersheba Mental Health Centre and the Herzog Memorial Ezrat-Nashim Hospital in Jerusalem.

Their research duplicated that of their colleagues at the U.S. National Cancer Institute.

The head of research at Herzog Hospital, Dr. Richard Ebstein, said the gene, called D4DR, was first discovered in the United States in 1991.

He added that it functions in the section of the brain which controls emotions.

Clothing store Edna Schwartz soon to close doors

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After 25 years at The Colonnade on Bloor Street, the name Edna Schwartz will be retired on Feb. 28, 1996.

But Options, an import shop which evolved from Edna Schwartz and is just a few doors away in the same building, continues under an extended lease.

Schwartz had worked for Harridges on Bloor in the '60s before opening her own business in 1970 at the prestigious new Colonnade location. She was something of an upstart. Along that Establishment row, there was no name like Schwartz and her approach was different.

She built up her own clientele by selling affordable, quality classics, like good suits and sportswear, mainly to young women.

In 1978, Sam Merson, a businessman from South Africa, where he had operated a fine ladies' wear import shop, bought a 50 per cent interest from Schwartz. A year later, when Schwartz was in failing health, he became sole owner, agreeing to retain the name.

She died shortly after.

Today, Merson, together with his son-in-law and daughter, David and Elana Seligman, are co-owners of Edna Schwartz and Options, which opened at the Park Plaza in 1983 and moved to The Colonnade in 1988.

"About three years ago, we began to notice a change in the buying habits of our clientele," notes Seligman. "Our customers were rising up the corporate ladder. The young law school graduate who had purchased her first suit from us at Edna Schwartz is now a CEO. She and others like her will select distinctive looking suits which can't be found in the malls.

"The time has come to move on. And Options is the future!"

In addition to the store on Bloor Street, there is an Options at First Canadian Place, convenient to the downtown office core.

Seligman stresses that Edna Schwartz has always been a family business and staff longevity, from eight to 25 years, assures friendliness and personal attention. The trend continues with Options, he says.

Customers have been loyal and are now bringing in a second generation. Some clients, former Torontonians or visitors, are scattered from the Northwest Territories to Newfoundland. Elana Seligman may fill an order for merchandise to be shipped to St. John's, Nfld., where the customer makes her selection and returns the rest.

Edna Schwartz will be open during regular business hours until the lease expires at the end of February.

Film critic discusses Hollywood's good, bad, ugly

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

VAUGHAN — Viewers of Hollywood films receive mixed messages with regards to Judaism, says the chief film critic for the New York Post.

At a recent talk entitled The Good, The Bad and The Ugly, sponsored by Aish HaTorah, Michael Medved, also co-host of Sneak Previews on PBS-TV, said movies send out all kinds of different messages about Judaism.

"The good message is that Hollywood is now allowing more Jewish characters to appear in movies and is also willing to treat Jewish issues. There used to be the fear that if Jews were portrayed on screen, non-Jews would not come to see the film.

"In old Hollywood, flavorful rye and pumpernickel bread were transformed to bland Wonderbread. In general today, Jewish flavor in films is retained. There is less allergy to the Jewish message."

He said the good message behind this is that Jews are part of the mainstream. It is OK to be Jewish and people can appear in films and television with Jewish names.

However, the bad message is that all Jewish television characters are either intermarried or have a non-Jewish love interest, says Medved.

"It is almost as if it is a rule. I find it peculiar, for instance, that in the television show Brooklyn Bridge, about a Jewish family, the young boy's love interest is a Catholic girl.

"This does not reflect real life. In the United States, 40 to 50 per cent of Jews marry non-Jews which is not good, but in Hollywood, it is virtually 100 per cent."

He said this conveys that there is something dramatic and romantic about a Jew being drawn to a non-Jew. If there is love interest between two Jews, it is not a story worth telling.

"The fact that the Jewish character is by and large the male, shows a consistent contempt and denigration of Jewish women. The dominance of men in the entertainment industry has led to the dominance of intermarriage in movies — these are men who think Jewish women are not good enough to date."

He added the only Jewish stars who seem to portray Jewish parts are Barbra Streisand and Bette Middler, whom he claimed are earthy but not glamorous. "There are a large number of glamorous Jewish stars but they never play Jews. In Shadowlands, Deborah Winger played a Jewish woman who converted to Christianity."

Medved said the general public thinks that the entertainment industry speaks for Jewish values and "that is the ugly message. It is difficult to separate Jewish identity with this industry.

"The entertainment industry is known for being detached from our people, yet we get blamed for it offending people's sensibilities. One of my worst moments as a film critic was attending a screening of a film entitled The Pope Must Die. The film was presented by Jews and was shown to a group of priests and nuns. These are the kinds of things for which we are blamed."

He stressed that we must deal with this ugly message by raising our voice. "When Jewish organizations are silent about the corruption of young people and women, it leads to the belief that we have nothing to say, and if we have nothing to say as a community, then we have nothing to say about the values that shape people's lives.

"We must tell people that Hollywood does not hold a mirror up to reality. It is a twisted mirror and it is particularly twisted with respect to Jewish issues. Hollywood has not touched the story of young Jews becoming more and more involved in Judaism."

Medved said that the best way to change what we see on the screen is to change the people behind the screen, and he praised Aish HaTorah for its attempt to do that. "The work done by Aish HaTorah is needed in order to raise a Jewish voice and reach out to the unaffiliated."

Guidebooks may be of assistance

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

If you're planning warm-weather and/or cold-weather holidays in North America or elsewhere, the following new guidebooks may be of assistance.

•South Beach (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $28.95) is photographer Bill Wisser's lush tribute to Miami Beach's swinging Art Deco neighborhood, a favorite haunt of tourists. As you flip through its pages, you'll probably be tempted to buy a one-way ticket to Miami.

•Disney World and Beyond (Raincoast Books, $18.95) proves the point that there is much more to Orlando, Fla., than Disney World. But the emphasis of Stacey Ritz's useful guide is, of course, the Disney empire, the state's biggest draw.

•Honolulu (Raincoast Books, $12.95) invites you to explore a metropolis sometimes overlooked by travellers in Hawaii. Chock full of photographs and maps, this guidebook is packed with practical, up-to-date information.

•Rocky Mountain States (Raincoast Books, $27.95) is tailor-made for travellers drawn to national parks and outdoor winter sports, particularly skiing. It is a veritable storehouse of knowledge.

•San Juan & Gulf Islands (Raincoast Books, $15.95) is a succinct compendium of a favorite destination adjacent to Vancouver Island. You'll read about the best cycling paths, the finest hiking trails and the most popular shops and restaurants.

Iraqi's portrait a riveting story

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

With the fifth anniversary of the Gulf War a week away, Shelley Saywell's riveting documentary on a dissident Iraqi scientist is appropriately timed.

Fire and Water, to be broadcast by TVOntario on Jan. 17 at 10 p.m., is a portrait of Hussain Shahristani, a Shi'ite who declined to build an atomic bomb for Iraq's Sunni Muslim strongman, Saddam Hussein.

Shahristani, a University of Toronto graduate, was appointed Hussein's chief nuclear advisor in the 1970s, when Iraq had visions of dominating the Middle East.

In 1979, a year before Iraq invaded Iran, Shahristani was ordered to develop an atomic device. When he refused, Hussein countered by saying it was his duty to serve his country. Shahristani was unmoved. In a final, imprudent act of defiance, he condemned Iraq's deplorable human rights record.

Shahristani was arrested, tortured for 22 consecutive days and nights and banished to prison in Baghdad for life. Hussein's brother-in-law offered him a way out if he relented, but Shahristani was adamant.

He languished in prison until the outbreak of the Gulf War, when he escaped, rejoined his family and went into exile in Iran, a circumstance that remains a thorn in Iraq's side.

Since then, Shahristani has become a human rights activist, focusing his attention on Iraq's campaign of brutality against the Marsh Arabs, the descendants of the ancient Sumerians.

According to Saywell, 250,000 Marsh Arabs have been killed or displaced by Iraq in the past few years.

Fire and Water, which is narrated by Kate Nelligan, is first and foremost a chilling expose of Iraq's unbridled regional ambitions. Shahristani, a quiet, reflective individual, claims that Hussein sought "to reshape the map of the Middle East."

The Iraqi dictator might have succeeded had Shahristani used his talents to provide Iraq with a nuclear arsenal, Saywell believes. Shahristani recoiled from this task because he considered it "dangerous, immoral and unethical."

Fire and Water also paints a compelling picture of Hussein, whom Shahristaini describes as "a person with a complex," who behaves like a Babylonian king.

Finally, Fire and Water is a poignant account of a tight-knit family. For 11 years, as he rotted in a cell, Shahristani's Canadian-born wife — Bernice Holtom, a convert to Islam — and their three children never wavered in their loyalty, dedication and love.

One might ask why Shahristani continues to live in Iran, not exactly a model of religious or political pluralism, when Canada has offered him asylum.

The answer is clear. Iran lies in close proximity to the Marsh Arabs, whom Shahristani is trying to save from further harassment and death.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Spielberg Archive Screens Early Zionist Film, Rare Dreyfus Footage: A special award was presented to the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem for its presentation of the first-ever retrospective of pre-state Israeli films at the recent Pordenone Silent Film Festival in Italy.

The award was granted to the Spielberg Archive for its contribution to enriching the knowledge of Israeli film-making in general and specifically those made in the silent film era. While most of the 35 films in the retrospective came from the archive's own collection, several were contributed by Czech, Dutch, British, American, Danish and German film archives.

Among the rare films shown by the archives was one shot in Rennes, France, during the second trial for treason of Alfred Dreyfus in 1899. The film contains scenes of Dreyfus walking in prison with his jailers and of his wife leaving the prison after visiting him. Having only recently come to light, it is believed to be the only authentic film footage showing Dreyfus at the time of the affair.

Another rare film was Springtime in Palestine, produced by Keren Hayesod in 1928. The most ambitious Zionist film produced in the 1920s, it was considered lost until a surviving print was found recently in the German Federal Film archives.

Israeli Standard Of Living Rises

JERUSALEM – Israelis improved their standard of living in 1995, earning more money during the year and spending more of what they earned.

Israel's per capita personal disposable income grew by five per cent during 1995, while consumer spending grew by four per cent, according to figures released this week by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

Israel's tourism industry also experienced an upswing in 1995, with a 15 per cent increase in the number of visitors.

Japanes Investors Show Interest In Israel

TEL-AVIV – Some of Japan's largest investment groups have expressed interest in launching investment activities in Israel following a seminar conducted by Bank Hapoalim in Tokyo.

The bank's chief representative for Canada, Rafi Ben-Ami, said many of the 150 Japanese business leaders who participated in the seminar in December held private meetings with members of the Hapoalim delegation. Israel-Japan trade has already grown to $2 billion (US) annually, with Japan now Israel's largest export market after the United States.

Some of the Japanese participants included Sumitomo Bank, Fuji Bank and Mitsubishi Ltd.

Classifieds Really Do Work!!!

Dear Ella,

I am a 34-year-old woman and have been playing in the single's circles for years.

It finally happened! I met the most wonderful man. He is kind, funny, romantic and honest – all the traits that are important to me. He is originally from Russia and has lived here for almost seven years now. Avram speaks with a strong accent, but his English is good.

I finally decided I would take him to meet my parents. My parents are of Polish decent and have very strong values. They are also overprotective, possibly because I was an only child.

The evening went well until after dinner when we retired to the couch. Then my mother asked that unavoidable question: "So what do you do?"

Avram told them he builds frames for furniture at a factory.

Ella, you had to see their faces drop. The tone for the rest of the evening was set after that. They were cold and borderline rude. I was very embarrassed and had to get out of there fast.

I love my parents dearly but will not let them ruin the first good relationship I have found in a long time.

From Russia with Love

Dear From Russia with Love,

Congratulations!

It sounds like you have met a very special person, and from the sound of your letter, a good match for you.

Try to put yourself in your parents' place. They love you very much and have raised you with their own vision of how and with whom you will end up. Their dream is that you should want for nothing. Your parents have not yet had a chance to learn of Avram's qualities. All they know is that he does not fit the exact mould that they envisioned for you.

Give them a chance to get to know him. You said yourself that they have very strong values. Let them learn, the way you did, what a special person Avram is.

Try to use patience instead of anger and it will work out for you.

The Weekly FOOD GUIDE

Tasty New Products at Highland Farms

Here's a new taste treat to die for. Frozen profiteroles, those little balls of whipped cream-filled pastries, created by Delizza Patiseries. Louie Coppa told me they were so good they're addictive. I tried them, and he's right. $2.99 for 20, in the freezer near the meat counter.

Speaking of the meat counter, Highland Farms is known far and wide for the quality of its prime ribs. Suppliers are under strict instructions to butcher only the properly-sized steer, and then the sides are aged nearly three weeks before entering the climate-controlled preparation room at Highland Farms. Lean, ready for the oven or barbecue. Their meat section is truly remarkable; the day I counted, there were 135 different cuts of meat and poultry! Outstanding!

Canada, Israel free trade

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A free trade agreement between Canada and Israel will go into effect on July 1, pending approval by both governments.

Negotiators hammered out an agreement in principle in Israel last week, capping 14 months of talks.

If approved, the agreement will remove all tariffs on industrial products on July 1. Experts predict that bilateral trade would triple.

"We could be exporting $500 million a year to Israel instead of $150 million," said Kevin Gore, chief negotiator for Canada.

Tariffs would remain in force for certain agricultural and fish products.

In the next few weeks, officials will finalize a few technicalities in the proposed agreement. The document will then be presented to both governments for review, with the goal of implementing it July 1.

Gore said he would urge the Canadian government to adopt the agreement in full. "If either side begins making changes the whole agreement could collapse," he warned.

Israel has been pressing for a free trade agreement with Canada for many years, but Ottawa was reluctant to sign one in the aftermath of the North American Free Trade Agreement [NAFTA].

However, Israel's other free trade agreements with the United States and European Union put Canadian exports to Israel at a great disadvantage – in fact that eventually convinced Canada to alter its position.

The foundation for the agreement was laid during the visit of Yitzhak Rabin to Canada in November, 1994, when he and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien shook hands on the issue.

"This agreement in principle consummates that commitment," said Canada's ambassador to Israel, David Berger.

Currently, some Canadian exports to Israel, such as paper products, face tariffs of over 40 per cent. "These will disappear on July 1," said Gore, noting that there will be no gradual phasing out of tariffs as in NAFTA.

A period of adjustment is not necessary, he explained, because both sides have already adapted to an open market and because the volume of trade between the two countries is not that great.

In 1994, Canada imported $182 million worth of goods from Israel and sold Israel $149 million in Canadian merchandise.

The total volume of trade reached $350 million in the first nine months of 1995.

The agreement will also apply to the West Bank and Gaza Strip by virtue of the customs union between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"An important aspect of the agreement is that it takes into account the considerable amount of trade that each side does with the United States," said Israeli negotiator Dr. Gabriella Cohen.

Israel security chief

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – In an interview with the Jerusalem Post several years ago, Adm. Ami Ayalon displayed a reticence that in retrospect seems appropriate for the man named last week as the new head of the General Security Service.

Feature

The interview dealt with Ayalon's role in the attack in 1969 by a naval commando force on Green Island, a fortified Egyptian position in the Red Sea. The admiral was clearly uncomfortable talking to a reporter, particularly about himself. Slowly, he related his part in the story, a role which won him the nation's highest award for bravery. He spoke at first in sparse sentences that cloaked more than they revealed but as he began to relive the moment the telling became more animated.

The event had taken place during the War of Attrition along the Suez Canal. The Egyptians, recovering from the debacle of the Six Day War, were laying down massive artillery barrages daily on the Bar-Lev Line and launching commando raids across the canal with increasing boldness.

Radical right mute in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
and DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporters

Only weeks after shloshim services were held for Yitzhak Rabin, two Jerusalem yeshiva students were convicted of spitting on the grave of the assassinated Israeli leader.

While they face a maximum of three years in jail, the act demonstrated yet again the contempt in which Rabin was held by some members of the Orthodox community.

Rabin's assassination appears to have been an entirely homegrown affair, though echoes of support for the assassin, Yigal Amir, have been heard in Israel and the United States.

Only faint hints of support, if any, for Rabin's assassination have been heard in Canada, but some in the Jewish community, who have their ears to the ground, say a more serious concern has been the escalating level of rhetoric heard prior to the assassination.

Shortly after Amir's arrest, the Israeli media reported a Canadian had come forward to bankroll the confessed murderer's legal defence.

It was later revealed those reports were wrong, but former Canadian Jewish Defence League leader Meir Halevi said "It wouldn't surprise me if people in Toronto were supporting Amir's defence fund."

Halevi, who has also headed the Canadian version of Kach, Rabbi Meir Kahane's political party that was banned in Israel, said Toronto is "more traditional and right wing" than other North American cities.

"Not that the assassination had the blessing of people, but before the assassination people came up

CANADA

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several Jewish Canadians were among the 68 appointments to the Order of Canada announced this month by Governor General Romeo LeBlanc.

Promoted to Companion, the Order's highest rank, was composer Louis Applebaum of Toronto.

Named an Officer was Abel Joseph Diamond of Toronto (architecture).

Appointed Members were Jack Bell of Vancouver (philanthropy); Frances Belzberg of Vancouver (volunteerism); Gordon Brown of Montreal (volunteerism); Yhetta Miriam Gold of Ottawa (social sciences); Senator Jack Marshall of Ottawa (politics); and Joseph M. Tanenbaum of Toronto (philanthropy).

Mitterrand Condolences

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress last week sent a letter to France's ambassador to Canada extending condolences on the death of former President Francois Mitterrand.

Mitterrand encouraged a more balanced policy in the Middle East and was the first French president ever to visit the Jewish state, states Congress' letter to Ambassador Alfred Siefer-Gaillardin.

The late president showed strong leadership when he joined a national protest following the 1990 desecration of a Jewish cemetery in Carpentras, Congress noted.

Changes Delayed

OTTAWA — The introduction of new selection criteria to assess skilled immigrants, released by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi two months ago, has been put on hold indefinitely.

The new regulations were to come into force Feb. 8 but concerns raised by immigration lawyers have delayed them.

The new rules would place increased emphasis on an applicant's knowledge of English or French, as well on skills and ability to adapt quickly to the Canadian job market.

Superstein Honored

EDMONTON — The University of Alberta recently honored longtime Jewish community activist Jake Superstein with a honorary doctor of laws degree.

Superstein, 80, came to Canada from Pinski, Poland, in 1928 and along with his father and brothers, founded the Edmonton Produce Company.

He was awarded the degree in recognition of his "voluntary service to the community and his devout contributions in advancing harmony, compassion and genuine kindness to all citizens."

Camp BB on Net

OTTAWA — Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa says it is the first Jewish summer camp in Canada to be on the Internet.

The camp has announced the Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa Home Page, featuring information, color photos and other data.

It can be found at http://www.ottawa.net/— saul/camp.

ISRAEL

Oslo 2 First Reading

JERUSALEM — The Knesset last Monday night passed, on first reading, the bill implementing the Oslo 2 peace accord, by a 41-32 vote.

MKs from the Orthodox Shas party were absent.

The bill would implement different aspects of the Oslo 2 agreement, including a clause allowing Arab residents of east Jerusalem to vote in the Jan. 20 Palestinian elections.

Arab Voting

JERUSALEM — A survey by Haifa University into voting trends among Israeli Arabs has revealed a marked drop in support for right-wing parties and a dramatic rise in support for the Labor Party and the left-wing bloc.

The survey of 1,200 Arab voters, conducted last autumn, shows that 95 per cent of respondents said they would vote for Labor, left-wing and Arab parties.

Only five per cent said they would vote for the Likud or smaller right-wing or religious parties.

In the 1992 elections, right-wing and religious parties garnered 22 per cent of the Israeli Arab vote.

Willing to Send Troops

JERUSALEM — The United States would be willing to send troops to the Golan Heights to help Israel and Syria implement a peace deal, U.S. Secretary of Defence William Perry said last week during a visit here.

If an agreement calls for a peace monitoring force in the Golan Heights, and if both Israel and Syria request that United States participate, "we are prepared to do that," Perry said after talks with Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

Mine Kills Three

JERUSALEM — Three Israeli civilians were killed and one injured earlier this month when their jeep ran over a land mine in the Sinai.

A group of 13 Israelis had flown to Sharm el-Sheikh, where they rented four jeeps for a desert outing.

Shortly after they set out, one of the jeeps detonated an old mine.

The charge, apparently from a minefield laid by the Egyptians before the 1967 Six Day War, had apparently been washed into the popular jeep routes during flooding.

Swedish Writer Dies

STOCKHOLM — Swedish journalist Arvid Fredborg, one of the first people to report the scope and goals of the Holocaust died last week near here. He was 80.

Fredborg's 1943 book, Behind the Steel Walls, detailed the extermination of Jews at death camps, and estimated that two million Jews had been killed up to that time.

The book created a stir in Sweden and was published in English in 1944.

Ethnic, religious groups plan to lobby gov't on cutbacks

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups have taken the initiative in forming a coalition with other major religious groups and the Chinese, Italian and Portuguese communities, to lobby the Ontario government to ease the effect of cutbacks on the poor, seniors, the disabled and those dependent on non-profit housing.

"We had to take the bull by the horns and work with other faiths in presenting a positive program," said Harold Brief, chair of a committee representing Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT).

One of the six points agreed upon by the coalition is a request that services provided by religious and/or ethnic communities for their own people be allowed to continue because of their efficiency, volunteer support and fundraising ability.

The report, presented to an Ontario region meeting Jan. 11, was endorsed by representatives of the Anglican, Catholic, Seventh Day Adventist and United churches, as well as by delegates from the Chinese, Italian and Portuguese communities.

A small working group will prepare a position paper to be presented to the government, Brief said.

"We understand the door is slightly open now," he said. "In the past there was no chance for consultation."

When a Congress delegate asked if the coalition intended to criticize the "undemocratic nature" of the government cuts, Brief said it was more interested in presenting a positive program.

Concern for society's most vulnerable and the statement that the Ontario government must represent all the people are among the six main points endorsed by the coalition. They also support the need for transition measures to help social service providers and their clients, and for new tax powers by municipalities in the face of increasing caseloads, including breaks for non-profit groups.

It is also suggested that the government change regulations governing social service delivery in a variety of areas, includng child care, to increase efficiency.

Representing the JFGT on the coalition are Alan Sandler, Gerry Richler and Morris Zbar, while Congress is represented by Brief, Rabbi Dow Marmur and executive director Manuel Prutschi.

Racism report critiqued

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A York University study that found white residents of Toronto do not generally harbor racist views drew mixed reviews, with critics arguing it was too limited in its definition of racism.

"The authors are defining the term racism narrowly," said Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights. "They are using the term only to mean those people who hold blatantly bigoted views."

The report found 58 per cent of whites believe "visible minorities often get better treatment than other Canadians," she pointed out. The statement "is simply not true" and the fact that whites believe it indicates a "backlash in the view of visible minorities."

Even more, the statement represents a "racist view, but that's not the way people view racism. If you suggest it's racist, they get defensive," she added.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, interpreted the study's findings differently.

"Toronto is a pretty good place to live ... I don't think anyone ever suggested that Toronto is a city rampant with racism. We've had some troubles and we deal with them as they occur," he said.

The report, conducted by York University's Institute for Social Research, found that "in general, white Torontonians cannot be viewed as having racist views."

The study "does not sustain these gross claims that come from some quarters that there are widespread negative attitudes towards non-whites in Metro. The data does not bear that out," said York professor Paul Grayson, author of the study.

In the survey, 85 per cent of whites agreed with the statement that "visible minorities have made an important contribution to the cultural life of Canada," while only nine per cent disagreed.

Eighty-one per cent of whites agreed that "it should be against the the law to treat visible minorities different from other Canadians" and 79 per cent disagreed with the statement that "most visible minority people are not prepared to work as hard as other Canadians."

The report also concluded that whites are by-and-large opposed to forcing businesses to hire minority workers. Only 29 per cent agreed with the statement, "If companies have few visible minority workers, they should be made to hire more visible minority workers when they hire new staff." Sixty-four per cent disagreed with that statement.

Meanwhile, a second York University study, also prepared for the Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario Criminal Justice System, found that blacks believe they are treated worse than whites by police.

Seventy-nine per cent of blacks, 60 per cent of Chinese and only 50 per cent of whites believe that blacks are treated worse than whites by police.

Will Bathurst St. become the Jerusalem of Toronto?

TORONTO — It might not be a bad idea for Bathurst Street to be renamed Jerusalem Street in honor of Jerusalem 3000, Rabbi Dow Marmur suggested jokingly, but there are several obstacles.

"There are too many property owners and residents who would have to give their approval, and besides the street goes through five municipalties," he said.

Rabbi Marmur was reporting on behalf of the Israel Affairs Committee to the Ontario Region of Canadian Jewish Congress on efforts to mark Jerusalem's 3000th anniversary.

So far, the best prospect is in the City of York, where rabbis of three synagogues have agreed on the street to be renamed in their area, but residents must still be consulted, Rabbi Marmur said.

He said Mayor Barbara Hall of Toronto also displayed a "positive" attitude towards the Congress request to rename a street, but renaming Bathurst Street was not discussed with her.

Palestinians undertake transition to democracy

"Going to the polls" is a phrase that we in the West readily understand. It sits easily with us. It is commonly used in our language because it is part of the deep structure of our way of life.

In two days, on Jan. 20, the Palestinian residents of the West Bank, Gaza and the Arab-populated areas of Jerusalem will also be going to the polls. But in the context of Palestinian elections, the phrase "going to the polls" has never been used before. It does not mean, of course, that democracy, in its full and true sense, will have arrived for the Palestinian people. For, apart from Israel, nowhere in the Middle East has democracy in any sense arrived for any people. But it does mean that the beginning of the long, arduous transition to democracy for Israel's troubled and troublesome neighbors may possibly be closer by a small, but significant step.

This week across my desk, I received a concise primer on the Palestinian elections prepared by David Goldberg, PhD, director of research and education at the Foundation for Middle East Studies. The foundation is a research organization that provides information and research to individuals, groups and agencies within the Jewish community of Canada. As anyone who knows Goldberg will attest, the quality of the work is excellent. He writes in a manner true to his training and responsive to his readers' needs. Thus, his work is comprehensive and carefully footnoted, but written in a style which is comfortable for the lay reader.

He provides the historical background to the elections, explains their technical aspects, and then offers some interpretative analysis about their implications.

I shall try to give a brief variation of Goldberg's summary.

The elections were born in the Declaration of Principles (DoP) agreed to between Israel and the PLO on Dec. 13, 1993.

Though the DoP provides the legal authority for the elections, the genesis of the idea lay in the Camp David accords signed by then-prime minister Menachem Begin and president Anwar al-Sadat in 1978, and subsequently reintroduced in the 22-point plan formulated in May 1989 by the Likud-Labor national unity government headed by Yitzhak Shamir.

As of this writing, 1,013,235 people have registered to vote. They will be choosing from among 700 candidates for incumbency to an 88-member council elected from 16 electoral districts. Arab residents of Jerusalem will also participate in the elections. All seats in the districts will go to the party with the most votes.

Two additional candidates, Yasser Arafat and Samiha Khalil, a 72-year-old veteran anti-Israel activist, are contesting the position of Ra'ees.

In his paper, Goldberg meticulously records the areas of division in Israel over the elections, between the skeptics and the enthusiasts, the Likud and the government. The former "are troubled by the participation in the election of Arab Jerusalemites," fearing this will "open the way to a Palestinian effort to redivide the city." They also assert that the new council will be a parliament in waiting for an eventual Palestinian state which will "constitute a mortal security threat to Israel."

The latter, on the other hand, contend that the elections are an integral component of Palestinian-Israeli reconciliation. The elections, they say, "will create a new psychological and social reality in the territories."

Goldberg is no naif. He does not gloss over the many contentious aspects of the electoral process that has been imposed upon the newly enfranchised electorate by Yasser Arafat and his followers. He does not idealize the participants, both candidates and electors, as converts-to-democracy along the road to Ramallah. Nor does he glorify the impending event as a watershed in the history of the region.

He carefully places the elections in the context of the beleaguered, suspect process that he hopes will lead to a permanent, peaceful reconciliation between two peoples. One of the most effective guarantors of such a reconciliation would be the introduction into the Palestinian way of life of the norms and values of democracy.

Thus, Goldberg writes: "In the final analysis, the elections ... should be viewed as a means toward the fulfilment of true democracy for the Palestinian people, and not as an end in itself."

In the long run, democracy for the Palestinian people is as important to Israel as it is to "Palestine".

Ontario teens meet in kallah

TORONTO — Thirty-four teenagers from small Ontario Jewish communities came to Toronto for a recent four-day kallah (gathering) focusing on the Holocaust.

A key speaker at the High School Outreach Program of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region was Toronto survivor and partisan fighter Peter Silverman.

In the weeks prior to the kallah, students received material on Holocaust education, anti-Semitism and anti-racism, said Randie Cartman, program coordinator. "An extra day was added to this kallah so that our youngsters were not overwhelmed by the amount of information presented."

Students in scattered communities learn by correspondence through material sent out by Congress and periodic visits by Congress professionals, according to Dr. Harvey Erlich of Toronto and Judi Cartman of Sudbury, chairs of the Congress regional youth committee.

Some of the 34 participants in CJC Ontario region's high school outreach program for teens in small communities met in Toronto for a four-day kallah. In front is Sarah Chalmers of Peterborough. Frustrated lawyer may take refugee case to UN agency

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The frustrated lawyer for a woman who was denied refugee status in Canada on the grounds that, as a Jew, she could go live in Israel, says he may take the case to the United Nations.

And Yehuda Levinson predicts there will be a "flood" of dismissals of asylum claims from Jews, because Canadian officials have been emboldened by a recent court decision.

Other experts and community groups are still trying to come to terms with the controversial ruling, which they fear will single out Jewish refugee claimants for refusal.

In a decision made Nov. 23 but released last month, the Federal Court of Canada upheld an earlier Immigration and Refugee Board [IRB] ruling denying asylum to 65-year-old Antonina Grygorian, who claimed to have suffered personal anti-Semitic attacks in Azerbaijan [CJN, Dec. 21].

The IRB ruled that as a Jew, Grygorian could have availed herself of Israel's Law of Return, which guarantees citizenship to anyone who can prove one Jewish grandparent and states an intention to settle in Israel.

Grygorian, who came to Canada in 1994 to join her daughter and has shown no interest in settling in Israel, could have obtained Israeli citizenship "by a mere formality of application," the panel stated.

The Federal Court agreed, saying Canada's protection should only go to those who do not have "ready and automatic right to another country's nationality."

Late last month, the court refused the certification of a question — essentially an appeal — from Levinson. That means the matter can go no further in the courts.

But Levinson isn't through.

He's applied for what's known as a post-determination reevaluation of the case before an immigration official. In the meantime, Grygorian can stay in Canada.

If that fails, Levinson says he'll take the case to the Geneva-based United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Amnesty International and other human rights groups.

Meanwhile, he fears Grygorian can be deported to Azerbaijan, her last place of residence, or to her native Russia.

Levinson had pointed words for the Federal Court judge's understanding of the Law of Return, saying, "He just didn't get it."

On the other hand, he said nothing is preventing another court challenge of a similar IRB ruling, and the possibility of a completely different outcome. And Levinson said he would be "shocked" if he eventually lost this case.

There have been contradictory rulings. Last May, an IRB panel concluded that the Law of Return makes it clear that a desire to settle in Israel is necessary to obtain Israeli citizenship, and that Israeli law requires "demonstration of such desire by actual immigration" to Israel.

But many in the Jewish community worry the Grygorian ruling — the first of its kind — sets a dangerous precedent.

Perry Romberg, acting national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), said the decision smacks of Canada's wartime "none is too many" policy on Jewish immigration.

It also "infers that Israeli citizenship is automatic to all Jews."

Romberg said IRB panels are now free to use the ruling. "Those panels that might not be friendly can easily quote this," he said.

"It's not happening to anyone but Jews, who should have to same full access to the law as anyone else."

Toronto immigration lawyer Harvey Savage, meantime, plans to challenge the court ruling before an IRB panel in April.

He'll argue the decision contravenes Section 15 of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedom, which guarantees equality before the law regardless of race, religion or ethnic origin.

Savage said the decision has sent "shock waves" through the IRB, some of whose members are "appalled" by it.

Well-known refugee lawyer David Matas of Winnipeg called the ruling "totally ridiculous" and "unreal" and said he would like the Canadian government to assess the risk of Grygorian's deportation to Azerbaijan.

Matas called on Israel to get involved and state a policy on people who are eligible to immigrate and have nowhere else to go.

Eli Yerushalmi, chargé d'affaires at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, told The CJN that Israel's policy "is clear. Every Jew who wants to come is eligible [for citizenship], and that's it."

He said Israel does not interfere in the policies of other nations.

Supreme Court to consider school funding case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Rivka (Riky) Young, the high cost of a Jewish education has forced her to limit her daughter Hila's day school experience to the elementary grades.

Backgrounder to the news

With university looming on the horizon and tuition fees reaching $5,000 to $6,000 per year, it was one or the other, she said.

Ironically, Young could have avoided that dilemma had her mother made another choice years ago in Israel.

Young's mother was a practising Catholic, but she converted to Judaism in Israel before Young was born.

Had her mother not converted, Young would have had no trouble giving her daughter a Catholic education — at the taxpayers' expense. Being Jewish has meant she's had to lay out tens of thousands of dollars in tuition fees for Hila to get at least an elementary school education.

She'd like to have sent Hila, 17, to a Jewish high school, but "if Hila wants to go to university, I can't afford that and a Jewish school. It would be too much money," Young said.

Young is angry that, as a taxpayer, she helps subsidize Catholic schools at the same time as high costs forced her to end her child's Jewish day school education.

"Why do the Catholics get the choice and the Jews don't?" she asked.

That's a question asked by many of the parents of the 10,000 Jewish children attending day schools in Ontario, not to mention thousands of other Ontarians.

Unhappy with the status quo, Young has joined four other parents with children in Jewish day schools who are suing the government of Ontario. They are asking the courts for an order to compel the province to support Jewish schools.

Over the past five years, the case has wound its way through the court system and on Jan. 23 and 24 it will be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC).

Lawyer Ed Morgan, who is representing the five Jewish parents, said his case comes down to two principles enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms — equality before the law and freedom of religion.

It is fundamentally unjust that one religious group receives a benefit not available to the members of other faiths, he said. However, two Ontario courts, including the Court of Appeal, have ruled that the bargain entered into at Confederation, which allows the funding of Roman Catholic schools in Ontario, takes precedence over charter rights.

Morgan believes there would be no conflict with that bargain if Jewish schools were funded in addition to Catholic ones. He also argues that what the parents are asking does not contradict the High Court's previous ruling in the Bill 30 reference, in which the SCC approved the extension of public money to Catholic schools from Grades 11 to 13.

The equality argument

In addition to the equality argument, Morgan believes that the current funding practice violates parents' freedom of religion. Since education is compulsory in Ontario, that line of reasoning goes, parents have to send their children to school.

Jewish parents, particularly if they're Orthodox, would not be able to fully exercise their religion if they had to send their children to public schools where they can't get the instruction in Jewish practice, prayer, philosophy, festivals and rituals, Morgan said.

At the initial trial, Justice Anderson found a violation of the charter's equality provisions, but he ruled that funding only Catholic schools was a reasonable limitation on those rights, given the goal of maintaining a pluralistic, religion-neutral public school system.

On appeal, a five-justice panel of the Court of Appeal unanimously found no violation of equality rights or of freedom of religion.

In addition, it ruled 4-1 against the parents on a subsidiary issue, the provision of funded health services in Jewish day schools. Matan Kezwer, child of one of the parents suing the province, could not get the medical treatment in a Jewish school that was available in public schools. The dissenting judge agreed with the parents that this was a health and not an education issue, and therefore his treatment should be funded even while he attended Jewish school.

Morgan said the 5-0 Court of Appeal judgment was disturbing, but the decision of the SCC to hear the case (it was not compelled to do so) gives him reason for optimism. The composition of the court has changed almost completely since its decision in the Bill 30 case, with only Chief Justice Antonio Lamer remaining.

In that case, the court considered the equality arguments advanced by Canadian Jewish Congress, which was an intervener, only in passing, Morgan said.

In addition, the SCC "is free to rethink its own rulings."

One argument they will be asked to consider is contained in an affidavit filed by a spokesperson for a bilingual Ottawa Jewish day school, which points to the fact that religion, not language, is the determining criterion on this issue, Morgan said. (Adding to the anomalous funding situation is the fact that Polish, Ukrainian, Hispanic, Portuguese and Filipino Catholics, none of whom could be said to have been part of the Confederation bargain, can benefit from full religious schooling, while Jews and Protestants cannot.)

Government assistance

The Jewish quest for government assistance for day schools goes back at least 20 years, said Manuel Prutschi, executive director of the Ontario region of Congress.

In 1972, Quebec extended significant sums to its independent religious schools and later in the decade "an initiative was launched through the North York board of education under which Jewish school were to come under the [aegis] of the board," Prutschi said.

The provincial government of the day successfully fought that move in the courts.

Then in 1984, Bill Davis, who was Ontario premier, announced that Catholic schools, which had been funded only to the end of Grade 10, would receive funding for the remaining high school years.

Congress then established the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), to lobby government for fair treatment for Jewish schools.

In 1984, the Shapiro commission studied the issue of funding for non-Catholic independent schools and in 1985, Bernard Shapiro recommended some sort of financial assistance be provided.

But governments of all three major parties have refused to do this, Prutschi pointed out.

Following the Bill 30 case, OJAEE decided to take the Jewish community's position directly to the courts. However, since only individuals can raise equality arguments, Congress helped locate the five parents who sued the government.

Joining the five Jewish parents (Adler, Grossman, Kezwer, Rapp and Young) were parents with children in Protestant schools, who are supported by the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools.

Interveners

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association joined the case as an intervener, arguing that extending funding to other religious groups would fragment the public system, which serves to bring together people from all backgrounds.

Other interveners who oppose the parents' position are the Metro Toronto School Board, the Ontario Federation of School Boards and most recently, the government of Quebec.

While Quebec does provide some funding to Jewish schools, Morgan suggested the province entered the fray because "they feel they don't do it out of constitutional requirements, but out of a generous policy."

A SCC decision, which is binding across the country, would affect them directly, Morgan added.

Although he would not put a dollar figure on the total amount that would go to Jewish day schools if he is succesful, Morgan said Congress estimates that funding all non-Catholic religious independent schools would add three per cent to Ontario's education budget.

During the 1980s, four independent public opinion surveys showed "a significant majority in the province felt that once separate schools were fully funded, that should be extended to independent religous schools operating under ministery guidelines," Prutschi said.

Slain soldier's mother urges 'listening in tolerant manner'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Disheartened by bitter divisions in Israeli society, Esther Wachsman believes the path to unity can be found in education — starting as early as the preschool years.

"What it will take is education towards communication, which doesn't only mean speaking, but listening in a tolerant manner, and being willing to accept that people who hold views other than your own are good people worth respecting and honoring," Wachsman said in an interview last Friday, enunciating each word for clarity.

The 47-year-old Jerusalem public high school teacher and mother of seven was in town to address the Lubavitch International Women's convention at Markham's Chimo Hotel Saturday evening.

A New York native who made aliyah in 1969, Wachsman became known world-wide via television news when her 19-year-old son Nachshon, a soldier in the IDF's elite Golani brigade, was kidnapped by Hamas terrorists in October 1994. Countless people prayed for his safety as they lit an extra Shabbat candle at his mother's request, but Nachshon was murdered by his captors during a failed Israeli rescue attempt.

Since then, Wachsman and her husband Yehudah, also 47, have devoted themselves to promoting peace and Jewish unity, all the while carrying out their everyday responsibilities. With children ranging in age from 9 to 23, they've made a point of not being away from home at the same time.

The enormity of Wachsman's commitment and the depth of her religious faith stand in contrast to her short physical stature. A motherly-looking woman with an unexpectedly winsome smile, she is wearing a black hat with colorful appliques, virtually covering her short-cropped hair.

As a religious Zionist, Wachsman resents being considered "an accessory to murder" because Yitzhak Rabin's killer was also Orthodox.

"I was very distressed to see an entire population being stigmatized because the assassin was of a religious background. I resent the fact that my children were uncomfortable wearing their kippot."

She knows of nobody who did not condemn the Nov. 4 murder, she stressed.

Following the assassination, Wachsman wrote a letter to Rabin's widow, Leah, asking her "as the mother figure of Israel" to try to unify the Jewish people, whatever their political stripe.

"Unfortunately that didn't happen," said Wachsman quietly, doubtless referring — among other incidents — to Rabin's pointed snubbing of Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu at her husband's funeral.

Wachsman doesn't condemn Leah Rabin for her anger. "Grief is a very individual emotion," she said.

Her own lack of rancor is almost surreal, but the hint of a tremor in her voice when she discusses her son's murder belies her calm exterior.

"I would not say it shook my faith, but I've certainly questioned G-d. I spent a great deal of time in study and contemplation, trying to find answers, and I discovered that there were none, that every soul is here on loan. The Creator of the Universe determines when that loan is redeemed, and sometimes it's a little too early. I accepted that, and I've learned to let that give me my strength."

She has derived further sustenance from phone calls and letters of support written by Jews and non-Jews alike. Since the family's ordeal began, they have received almost 17,000 letters. "Many, many" were from the Israeli Arab community.

Individual Arabs called to tell them that prayer vigils had been held at their mosques on her son's behalf, and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat phoned to let them know — through his adviser Achmed Tibi, who acted as Hebrew interpreter — that he would do everything in his power to save Nachshon.

Wachsman declines to state her political views publicly, but terms the peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians "problematic."

"I think Chairman Arafat has to be a lot more careful about his rhetoric [when he addresses the Palestinians] to gain credibility with Israelis, who are very concerned about his sovereignty within kilometres of our homes. Words have power, as we saw with the assassination."

Esther Wachsman

Pragmatism and yearnings (for land being given to the Palestinians, for example) don't necessarily coincide, she pointed out.

Wachsman would like to see Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres' vision of a "peaceful, democratic country with economic prosperity" expanded to include a Jewish identity component that comprises Jewish values and ideology.

"Going back to [the topic of] education, every schoolchild should learn of his Jewish roots and the richness of his tradition, whether he practises it or not. This should be taught with pride, and should be part of our curriculum. This is not the heritage [only] of the religious population."

One way in which Wachsman promotes Jewish unity is through her involvement in discussion workshops for Israeli youth from diverse backgrounds. Talking to one another shatters stereotypes, she explained.

Wachsman's husband, who met with the father of Nachshon's killer in a stunning gesture of peace following the tragedy, is in the process of establishing a centre for understanding, tolerance and friendship to be sponsored by world leaders including Arabs.

Other projects in memory of Nachshon and Nir Poraz (the Israeli soldier who led troops in the rescue attempt) include an institute to study bird migration.

Birds have no boundaries, explained Wachsman, adding that lives will be saved as a result of the research. Recently, a pilot was killed because a bird collided with his airplane, she noted.

"Everything we've done is for the purpose of life. If Nachshon's life and death are to have any meaning, then it is up to us now to make his memory beautiful."

Russian's rumblings

Russia has a new foreign minister. He is Yevgeny Primakov, former deputy director of the KGB and since 1991 the head of Russia's foreign intelligence service. He is considered to have been linked to the spy agency for over 30 years. In the parlance of pundits, he is known as a nationalist "hard-liner." He replaces Andrei Kozyrev, who, staunchly "pro-reform" and "pro-West," had become a lightning rod attracting incessant right-wing criticism in the Duma and on the streets of Moscow. As a result, he became politically expendable to his boss Boris Yeltsin, whose uncertain and fragile personal health has become symbolic of his government.

Primakov's appointment was greeted with great delight by the political opponents on both sides peering over Yeltsin's shoulder, including the head of the Communist party, Gennady Zyuganov, and neo-fascist Vladimir Zhirinovsky. The effusively enthusiastic response by two such questionable democrats to the news of Primakov's appointment gives westerners reason to pause, worried about the direction of Yeltsin's government if not, indeed, about the future of Russian democracy.

But when one adds to their response the nature of Primakov's remarks at his first press conference as foreign minister, it is no wonder that, in the words of the Globe and Mail, "there is widespread unease in Western capitals over his appointment."

He told reporters that he intends "to correct the imbalance" of Kozyrev's policies, that Russia "is a great power and our policy must reflect our status, that Russia will step up its efforts to defend its national interests." This was clear code language. According to Primakov, Russia's national interest is not necessarily coincident with the interest of collective security and freedoms championed by the West. More ominously, he implied that it may not even share the democratic values so treasured by the West.

When asked about his plans for Iraq in the scheme of Russian foreign policy, he answered that it occupied "a big place" in his view of the Middle East. This response is also quite troubling.

Saddam Hussein is a bully and a thug who, indifferent to the sufferings of his fellow Iraqis, singlehandedly has caused his country to be sanctioned and shunned. That he is a dictator is objectionable to us, but it simply places him in the company of a panoply of similar monocratic governors in the region. But that he is unrepentantly anti-West and anti-Israel places him in the company of Iran and Libya. (And possibly Syria; it is too early to tell.) All are enemies of democracy, freedom and peace, the very foundation stones supporting our way of life. If Iraq – and thus the values it represents – will have a "big place" in future Russian foreign policy, decision-makers in the West had better pay close attention to Russia's new foreign minister. His rumblings may lead beyond mischief.

As debate resumes

Along with the next phase of Palestinian self-rule and the ebb and flow of peace negotiations with Syria, the Israeli public is very much caught up in the question of whether the date for the elections should be moved up from October 1996. Regardless of the actual date of the election, for all intents and purposes, the election campaign in Israel has already begun.

With it we have already started to hear the rhetoric and feel the reheated elements from within the two main competing political camps that the peace process has engendered. But thus far at least, the arguments from the stump and the soapbox have been restricted to substantive policy differences.

Undoubtedly, local partisans of the two camps will transplant some of the emotions of Israel's campaign trail into the neighborhoods of the Diaspora. When that happens, as it surely will, we hope and pray that the language will be moderate, arguments restricted to issues, and the rhetoric muted.

In this issue of The CJN, staff reporters Paul Lungen and David Lazarus report that it is generally agreed in our own community there are no extreme, radical, religious or secular right wing advocates of violence. Thank God. But they also report, that before "the assassination", there was extremism and incivility throughout the debate on the peace process. As the debate resumes, we urge participants to ensure that extremism and incivility do not.

Slap in the face for Holocaust deniers

Canada Post is to be commended for issuing the new Holocaust stamp. It will help bring home to the general public the enormity of the tragedy that befell our people during World War II. I recommend that members of the Jewish community demonstrate their appreciation to Canada Post by purchasing blocks of these stamps and using them on every possible occasion.

It is gratifying to know that Holocaust deniers will probably be receiving mail bearing the stamp. Staring them in the face will be an unmistakable reminder that Canada has given official and graphic recognition to a historic reality which they labor with such crazed zeal to deny.

Money for woman and child, not Mike

I am responding in this way to a letter from Mike Harris asking me for a donation to the PC ONTARIO FUND "to support the efforts being made by your administration:"

After the fiscal fiasco of the Reagan Revolution, The Common Sense Revolution is a courageous attempt to restore the good name of revolution usurped by Marxism. It was for this reason, amongst others, that I intended to respond generously to your request. What upset my good intention, however, was a lady and her little kid cringing in the cold near the Roy Thomson Hall. She and her boy had been shut out of the shelter because of restructuring and they, like the PC ONTARIO FUND, asked me for help. I faced a defining moment of dilemma, which I eventually resolved by giving the lady the donation initially intended for you.

Still I feel I am obligated to you. I will make my obligation good when I get my 30 per cent tax cut.

Thank you for your understanding.

Supports Mike Harris policies

Re: "Ontario cuts forcing re-evaluation of services" by Morris Zbar, and the editorial "Govern, don't bully" (CJN, Dec. 14)

I am a member of the Progressive Conservative party and I proudly voted for the Mike Harris government this summer. I also favor many of the policies brought forward by the Reform party of Canada. I was also born Jewish.

I have been growing tired of the bashing of the Mike Harris government in your publication. To state that Jews, as well as other minorities, have to fear the policies of the Ontario Conservatives is unfounded. The announced cut-backs to various social services have been warranted for some time. For example, education tuitions should be increased in Ontario and user fees for the purchase of drugs are highly necessary. We finally have a fiscal conservative government in Ontario to be proud of.

Further, it should be stated that there are some Jews who favor what the Harris government plans to to. The fact that there are Jews who disagree with the Ontario Conservatives cannot be disputed. But, in the future, please remember that lumping together an entire community under one political umbrella is not a justifiable practice.

Cutbacks hit women, youth and poor

We are writing to register our opposition to and concern about the recent cutbacks in Ontario. In particular, we object to the targeting of social programs which serve women, youth and the poor.

We understand that change needs to occur and this is your mandate, but we question the common sense of focusing on social programs exclusively. Alternative methods of balancing the budget exist, including increasing tax revenues by creating liveable wage jobs. This and other methods need to be considered.

French courses at McGill for credit

Leslie Feldman is to be commended for recognizing the importance of learning French in his letter to The CJN of Jan. 4. However, he might be interested in discovering that courses offered through continuing education at McGill may be taken for credit. In fact, University regulations state that a student who has obtained permission from his/her home department may register in these courses and receive credit for them. All that is required is a letter of authorization from the student's home department.

Orthodox Jews must do some soul searching

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

After the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, it would be wonderful if all Jewish groups and Jewish individuals would rethink their positions and consider some serious soul-searching. As an Orthodox Jew, I do not feel that my own movement is behaving less morally than others. But as an Orthodox Jew, I feel bound to observe the advice of the rabbis (in Gemara Sanhedrin 18a) and not offer criticism to others until my own house is in order. That is why I have been constantly thinking about two questions: What has been the reaction of thinking centrist Orthodox Jews to the murder of Yitzhak Rabin? And what ought it to be?

Immediately after the tragedy, there was reason to believe that serious soul-searching might take place. Some wise Orthodox thinkers, like Rabbis Yehuda Amital and Aaron Lichtenstein in Israel and Prof. Shnayer Leiman in the United States, spoke movingly and introspectively about the assassination.

But very quickly the tone and direction of the discourse within the Orthodox world changed radically. In part, this was due to external factors. From outside of the Orthodox community, some of the most vicious and vile anti-Orthodox rhetoric ever heard began to be bandied about — as if all of Orthodox Judaism supported and supports the actions of Yigal Amir.

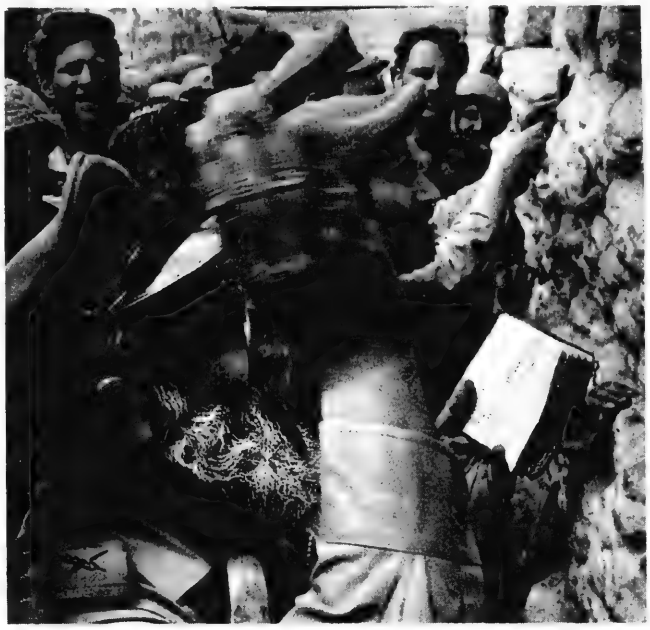
Today in Orthodox circles, rumors are being spread — at times with relish — about various ongoing despicable acts of discrimination against observant Jews. And there is no doubt that many of these stories do have a solid basis in fact. Even the left-leaning newspaper Ha'aretz reports that Orthodox Jews in Israel who wish to get accepted into elite army units have been going to their interviews without wearing kippot, for fear that they will not be accepted if they appear to be religious.

One result of all the anti-Orthodox discrimination and hateful rhetoric has been that many Orthodox Jews now see themselves as the primary victims of the entire tragedy. Orthodoxy has very swiftly moved from humble introspection to an assertive defence of the honor of the Torah and of the right to be Orthodox.

This Orthodox self-perception as victims, in its most extreme form, involves seeing the discrimination against Orthodoxy as systemic. A number of Orthodox Jews are saying that the basic structures of Israeli democracy — the Knesset, the police, the army and the courts — all discriminate against observant Jews. The Jewish Press of New York for example, refers to Israel as "a police state" in its front page headline.

Such charged rhetoric is very scary. Virtually every legal system in the world — including the halachic system — allows people who cannot obtain "natural justice" from the system to strive for that natural justice in extra-legal ways. There is then ample cause for concern that we may yet see further vigilante action by Orthodox Jews who have convinced themselves that the Israeli democracy is not a democracy.

But even independent of the "discrimination" factor, too many respected and thoughtful Orthodox Jews seem to have decided that all that is necessary after the assassination is to condemn Yigal Amir forcefully and unequivocally, to mourn the loss of a leader and the loss of Israel's innocence and then go about business as usual. Yehiel Leiter, for example, wrote in the YESHA Report shortly after Rabin's assassination that it wasn't the rhetoric of his community that killed Rabin, but the actions of one "deranged" man. If Amir was deranged and is not representative of his community, there is no need for introspection and soul-searching.



The reunification of Jerusalem in 1967 was the fulfilment of a 2,000-year- old dream for the Jewish people. For some people, it was also the inspiration and justification for the incorporation into the way of life and beliefs of religious Zionism of an element of "messianism", the extreme manifestation of which has culminated, tragically, in the actions of individuals such as Baruch Goldstein and Yigal Amir. [Photo from Israel/The Reality, Thames and Hudson, London, 1969]

But one just can't ignore the fact that Amir and the other famous Orthodox murderer of the '90s, Baruch Goldstein, attended the finest modern Orthodox schools and excelled in their studies. They were not sociopaths. They were well-integrated, respected members of their communities; it was impossible to tell them apart from their colleagues and friends. As Rabbi Lichtenstein said, on the day before the assassination the nationalist Orthodox community in Israel would have gladly shown off Yigal Amir as one of the great successes of its educational system. It is absurd then for the Orthodox community to say today that he and Goldstein are not representative.

What did the Orthodox community do after the murder of 29 Arabs in Hebron by Baruch Goldstein? The immediate reaction was impressive. Virtually to a man, Orthodox rabbis roundly condemned it. But it would appear that not all Orthodox Jews got the message that Baruch Goldstein's actions were "un-Orthodox." Some Orthodox Jews, including yeshivah students, continue making regular pilgrimages to Goldstein's grave. They are not ostracized by their communities or their yeshivot.

And some few respected Orthodox leaders, like Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, continue to say today that Goldstein's actions have to be "contextualized," that you cannot discuss what he did without remembering the atmosphere of hate against Goldstein's community generated by the Arabs who live in Hebron. In other words, after the Goldstein massacre, some Orthodox leaders and many Orthodox followers managed to portray themselves as the victims of the tragedy.

And now after the Amir murder, again Orthodox leaders universally condemned the action. And again there is good reason for concern that the reaction will be short-lived.

After the assassination, many argued wisely that rhetoric should be toned down. But has it been? Ha'aretz (Dec. 6) reports that a number of yeshivah boys confronted an on-duty Israeli army officer near Shechem and called him a murderer and a traitor. As of this day, they haven't been expelled from their yeshivah or even chastised. And it was well reported that outside of Madison Square Gardens during the recent pro-peace rally, religious demonstrators were calling Peres a murderer and a traitor.

For me, the saddest aspect of the latest developments has been the way Orthodox Jews are rallying to support rabbis who, in very inflammatory language, spoke out against Rabin. One such rabbi, Rabbi Nachum L. Rabinovitch, formerly of Toronto, said on Israeli radio that a person like Rabin is "mitchayev benafsho," which would normally be translated as meaning that he is deserving to die. To be sure, Rabbi Rabinovitch then clarified that he did not feel that humans should kill Rabin, rather that God ought to take care of it.

The same Rabbi Rabinovitch wrote in a piece that appeared in the Jerusalem Post on Dec. 27, 1993, that a time may be coming soon when Jewish soldiers who are asked to "act against their own people" (by removing settlers from settlements) will have to decide whether they wish to become moserim. The article makes it very clear that a soldier who would cooperate, and certainly a politician who would give such an order, would be a moser (loosely translated as "informer" or "oppressor") and would be comparable to a member of the Judenrat during the Holocaust.

And any student of rabbinic literature knows that a moser is liable to severe penalties in Jewish law and that many halachic texts allow or even encourage vigilante action against a moser without any of the standard rabbinic considerations about due process. (i.e., Shulchan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat 388:10.)

Many would consider such remarks offensive and potentially dangerous. Yet quite a few Orthodox Jews, including many Orthodox rabbis, have rallied to the support of those who made such hot-headed and dangerous comments about Rabin. Why has this happened?

I think that it is not the case that many Orthodox Jews actually agree with Rabbi Rabinovitch and his colleagues. But Orthodox Jews, like other minority groups, have a sense of group solidarity. They continue to see themselves as the vanguard of real Zionism and Judaism, the cream of the Jewish nation. Particularly now, when so many non-Orthodox people are speaking so many half-truths about Orthodoxy, some Orthodox Jews have decided to circle the wagons and defend the honor of all members of the "us" group.

As an Orthodox rabbi, I think that this is a very short-sighted and wrong-headed approach. I understand that it may not be popular to suggest that Orthodoxy should, so to speak, limit the free speech of its adherents. But let us recall that Orthodox Judaism has always set very clear limits on what constitutes orthodoxy and orthopraxy ("correct" behavior and "correct" belief). Orthodox Jews are willing to disqualify many Jews — and many rabbis! — from positions of authority, such as kashrut supervision or being the head of a yeshivah, because of infractions against accepted community standards, even infractions that are simply cases of "improper" speech. (Maimonides, Mamrim 3:1-7.)

Consider that the position currently adopted by Orthodox Jews, almost universally, is that a rabbi who expresses overly liberal views about an issue such as the divine origin of the Torah or the flexibility of halachah is no longer a member of the "us" group and would be, generally speaking, not trusted as a kashrut supervisor or a rosh yeshivah. But a rabbi who said publicly that Rabin is "mitchayev benafsho" is, so it would seem, still part of "us," and we will defend his right to say such things even if we don't totally agree.

What a terrible message is being conveyed to the world at large — and especially to members of Orthodox communities — by this attitude! Every Orthodox Jew, and every knowledgeable outsider, knows that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands of infractions of thought, speech and action that could cause a rabbi to lose his Orthodox credentials and become one of "them." But the clear message being taught is that labelling the prime minister of Israel a moser or venerating Baruch Goldstein is a tolerable infraction (or perhaps no infraction at all) and that the perpetrators of that "offence" are still part of "us."

Orthodox Judaism has, presumably unwittingly, put its adherents into quite a quandary. We must decide if we really identify with a group that has very restrictive rules on its membership but includes those who say inflammatory and dangerous things about the prime minister of Israel. Thoughtful Orthodox Jews are being forced to rethink what constitutes the "us" group and what contitutes the "them" group. Who is and is not part of my group? Am I to identify with Jews who share my views about the divine origin of the Torah but call Rabin a moser? Or with Jews who believe in change through democratic means, who renounce vigilante behavior, who pursue peace and eschew hateful rhetoric?

Orthodoxy should take steps to dissociate itself from its practitioners and leaders who advocate and teach positions that might lead to vigilante behavior. This should be done only in order to make it easier for people like me to identify with the group. It should also be done before another Goldstein or Amir arises from Orthodox ranks. And ultimately it should be done for the sake of Orthodox values, before Orthodoxy loses whatever respect it still commands among its adherents and among other Jews.

Impact of Crusades on Jews ignored

Nine hundred years ago, during the hiatus period between November 1095 and February 1096, the ideological seeds planted by Pope Urbain II at a conclave of churchmen and lay people at Clermont in France took root and the crusades were born.

By Arnold Ages

With astonishing speed and conviction, people from all social and economic classes joined together to travel to the Holy Land in order to free Christians from the yoke of Islamic rule and to liberate the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. Five different crusades until 1270 targeted Muslim interests, not only in Palestine, but in Spain as well.

The crusades achieved remarkable successes, such as the capture of Jerusalem in 1099, but also confronted disasters — the victory of the Muslim leader Saladin in 1187.

In a sense, the routing of Muslim forces in the Balkans at the end of the 17th century was the last chapter in Pope Urbain II's rally cry to Christendom to "liberate" the world from Muslim control.

What of the impact of the crusades?

One of the things about the crusades that has always perplexed historians is the explanation of the absolute faith and zeal which prompted hundreds of thousands of Europeans to uproot themselves from hearth and home and travel thousands of miles eastward in order to risk life and limb for the glory of their religion.

Jonathan Riley-Smith, the editor of a new book on the crusades, which Oxford University Press has released, provides some answers to this question. According to Riley-Smith the crusading spirit was inextricably intertwined with medieval Christian beliefs about sin.

In that world view, man was tainted from time immemorial, with an original sin that could not be erased without the mediating grace of the Church and its doctrines of salvation. In one bold stroke, the Church offered a short cut to salvation — participation in the holy exercise of ridding the world of Christiandom's arch rival in the Levant, the Muslims. For the crusaders, the promise of paradise in the next world, was irresistible.

Not all crusaders were motivated, of course, by such high theological insights. Some participated to escape the monotony of daily life, others to flee burdensome debt, still others to fulfil the desire for adventure and prospective booty. The combination of all these motives was sufficient, however, to maintain the critical velocity of the crusades for centuries.

A statistical audit of the books that have been published over the years about the crusades demonstrates a curious fact about the question posed above regarding the impact of the crusades on Jews. Riley-Smith's book is typical: it contains 408 pages of essays dealing with every aspect of the crusades from the esthetic to Islamic responses to Christian attacks. In the entire volume there are six scattered references to the fate of Jews. That, however, is an improvement over the article on the crusades in the latest edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica which, in its main 13-page article, does not even mention the fate of Jewish communities which suffered under the crusader boot.

Thus, an event which left thousands of Jewish dead along the Rhine pathways used by the crusader zealots on the way to the Holy Land, and which saw Jewish communities in the Levant similarly victimized by crusader zeal, is deserving of only insignificant peripheral mention in the new Oxford essay anthology and none at all in a major encyclopedia of the English-speaking world.

For redress of this glaring omission, the Encyclopedia Judaica provides a 5½-page summary of what the crusader desire to purify one's sins cost the Jewish communities in Europe and the Middle East.

"The crusades and their attendant degradation were firmly imprinted on the historic consciousness of the Jews. The period became singled out in the popular mind as the start of and explanation for the misfortunes of the Jews, although in fact the excesses were only symptomatic of a process which had already been set in motion."

Thus the crusades, like the Holocaust of this generation, marked an epoch-making juncture in Jewish history. Lamentably, in both events the fate of the Jews was shoved off into the periphery.

It worked with the crusades.

It will not work with the Holocaust.

The boundary between the sacred and the ordinary

Both the Torah and the Talmud are very concerned with boundaries. One of the first boundaries was that set for Adam and Eve in the garden — the limit of their access to two very special trees, the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and the tree of life. We all know the outcome of that experience in limiting the behavior of humans.

By Jean M. Gerber

A vital boundary is the one between the sacred and the everyday. Abraham Joshua Heschel, in his mystical assessment of time and space, taught that the Shabbat was the boundary between ordinary and sacred time. Through the Shabbat, Jews withdraw from the ordinary and, once a week, enter the sacred universe of the Shabbat.

Many limits have been set to distinguish between categories: boundaries between meat and dairy foods, between properties (removal of the marker of your neighbor's field was considered a serious theft), between the roles of men and women, between adult and child, slave and free person, Jew and non-Jew.

In the wake of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, the issue of the holiness of the land of Israel and the boundaries to be set between it and the rest of the world are at issue. This issue arises as modern nation states have used borders to define their existence. Many have therefore asked if the land is so sacred that its possession by a Jewish state overrides the worth of human life.

Anyone looking to the Bible to sort this out must be ready for some frustration. Are we ready to lay claim to David's kingdom or Solomon's, or the Protectorate which Herod administered for the Romans? Is Israel to seek borders that begin at the Nile and end at the Euphrates? I think not. But, many argue, if the land of Israel is holy, then the determination of its boundaries lies beyond human capacity to negotiate. This line of thinking has brought Jews in Israel, as well as in Canada, to the brink of civil strife.

One answer is that in creating the state, thousands of Jews were ready to die in order to define its borders. However, another way to look at that is to say they died so that Jews would have the opportunity to build a state and now is the time for the present State of Israel to define its borders in the here and now, not in the messianic future.

The late Yeshayahu Leibowitz (brother of the famous teacher of Tanach, Nehama Leibowitz) met the issue of the holiness of the land head-on in his article, The Uniqueness of the Jewish People, in the Jerusalem Quarterly (Spring 1981). His conclusions are worth our consideration now as never before.

The uniqueness and the mission of the Jews, according to Leibowitz, is not in any intrinsic holiness or special "soul of the nation," which, he maintains, does not exist. "There are, rather, Jewish individuals, living, breathing human beings," charged with observing the laws of the Torah. These laws are the vehicle through which, by striving to observe them, Jews achieve holiness. The concept that there is intrinsic holiness without action in Jews and the Jewish people is what Leibowitz called "the Judaism of Korach," who challenged Moses by asking why his position was so elevated, since, Korach asserted, "all the congregation is holy." On the contrary, holiness is only achieved by constant striving towards it on the part of humans. Only God is holy in and of himself.

Today both secular and observant Jews tend, in Leibowitz's opinion, to mistake the order of events. Assuming a special place for Jews is to grasp the wrong end of the stick. When Jews, secular or religious, accept a part of the mission entrusted to them, they aspire to create holiness. When they distort or miss the mark, they lessen the possibility of bringing holiness to their people and to the world.

Just as he argued for the power of Jews to become holy only by their actions, so Leibowitz argued that, contrary to much modern religious thought, there is no intrinsic sanctity in land. It is the actions of its inhabitants that sanctify or pollute the land. So, reading the midrash on levels of holiness — the holiest land being the land of Israel and the holiest city being Jerusalem, the holiest spot the holy of holies, Leibowitz deconstructed that series to mean that only when the inhabitants of that land and city were in themselves working to create holiness would the land become holy. (Recall that it was because of their wickedness that the Canaanites were expelled; and that once because of their idolatry and once for baseless hatred, the Jews were exiled.

In other words, mankind not geography, is responsible for the boundary between sacred and ordinary.

"The elevation of a country to the level of sanctity is pure idolatry," he wrote.

By making the land itself an object of veneration, Jews are at risk for the sin of worship of land and space rather than of the divine and the sacred. An idol can consist of rocks and sand, houses and schools, as easily as it can be a sculpted image.

He concludes, "The land is neutral, just as everything in this world is neutral. There is only one holiness, expressed in the threefold kedusha: " 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory.' Nothing apart from that is holy, either in history, in nature or in man; one can only sanctify objects through the service of the Lord."

If so, all of us have a long way to go.

The Shabbat of our lives

When recently I attended a convention in Atlanta, I dropped in on a session entitled The Spiritual Journey of the Older Adult. The speaker who got my immediate attention was a physician from the Boston area, Dr. Howard Weintraub. Literate and laid-back, he proved to be a master teacher. His audience was overwhelmingly "elderly" (I dare not say "old" since that term has become incorrect in today's society).

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Weintraub called us "persons in late adulthood," which is a time of life that for most people spells slow decline, impairment and loss. Having admitted these factors as inevitable, he proceeded to teach us how each of these negatives also had a positive counterpart. Decline could be balanced by renewal, diminished capacities by freedom and wisdom, and losses by gains.

He challenged us to admit the negatives and face them as inevitable. Physically, we are going downhill. The death of friends and family reminds us of the fate that awaits us down the line.

We see a decline of power. We are no longer in a position of authority; the younger generation has taken over. For some of us, this realization is simply numbing; for others, it spells disappointment and depression. All of which makes aging a time of losses.

But, said the doctor, there is another side, and we have to train ourselves to appreciate its presence and potential. There is also a new freedom that is to be used, not wasted.

Start with this: as the outer world shrinks, the inner world stands ready to open up. From tending to the material world and the acquisition of power and gain which absorbed us in the middle years of life, we can now turn to a grossly neglected area, the inner self and its values. Our time is freed up for introspect and for gaining an understanding of what life is all about. Six decades we toil, and then we are free to welcome the Shabbat of our lives.

We have made our contribution in the work we have done, in the families we have raised, the friends we have cherished, the community we have enriched as volunteers. This contemplation leads us (to use Eric Ericson's term) to achieving a sense of integrity.

Of course, we have to come to terms with the loss of function we experience in varying degrees; we have to acknowledge our mortality as something that is real and not just theoretical. We have to make up our minds that this is marvellous time for renewing our spiritual life.

It begins with a serious search for the Divine Power, which is achieved by contemplation, reading and joining with others engaged in the same enterprise. For those unaccustomed to prayer, it means giving it a chance. "We may fall in love again with the miracle of the world, even feel challenged to define for ourselves a new role in society and in nature, as this spiritualization of matter gradually infuses our perception."

This role will make us into the true "elders" of the community, role models for the younger generations. Whatever our physical state, there is for most of us room to grow spiritually. And, said Weintraub in closing, "Just as with a candle at the sundown of Shabbat, so at the havdalah of our lives, our earthy flame is extinguished in the wine of a vintage Jewish life, God willing."

The Kirshner File

A shtetl in Poland revisited

By Sheldon Kirshner

Had he known what lay ahead, Theo Richmond would not have undertaken the task. "Never, never," he chuckled. "I would not have had the courage."

When Richmond, a British documentary filmmaker, set out to write a chronicle of a former shtetl in Poland, he figured that he would have to spend about six months on the project. Instead, he labored seven years on his massive book, Konin: A Quest (Random House), which was published recently.

Although he was born in London and had never visited Poland, Richmond felt like "an ex-citizen" of Konin, which lay close to the German border prior to World War II.

His parents had been born and raised in Konin and his childhood had been filled with stories about it.

In the early 1960s, a group of Konin Jews in Israel, some of them survivors of the Holocaust, decided to publish a Konin memorial book. Richmond subscribed to it, and in 1968, the gigantic volume arrived by mail at his house in Surrey, near London.

Since the book was in Yiddish, he was unable to read it. "It was as inaccessible to me as a Dead Sea Scroll." Still, every now and then, Richmond glanced at the photographs in it.

In 1987, he resolved to unlock the contents of the memorial book. What fuelled his quest was not so much a desire to plumb his ancestral roots as a wish to know more about one small corner of a vanished world destroyed by the Nazis during the war.

In satisfying his curiosity, he thought, he might create a lasting memorial for the Jews of Konin.

Speaking by phone from Manhattan, where he was busily promoting his book, Richmond compared himself to a detective. Starting with only two or three clues, he gradually fleshed out the story of Konin.

Through it all, he said, there were "moments of elation" and "moments of despair."

When he began, the information at his disposal could barely fill a postcard. At the end, virtually every nook and cranny of his house was inundated with Konin memorabilia. "My home," he said, "became a Konin museum."

To amass the data, Richmond drew on the memories of about 50 ex-residents of the town, whose Jewish population in 1939 numbered 2,700 out of a population of 12,100. He interviewed former residents in Britain, Israel and North America, recording almost 400 hours of taped recollections. (Among the very few who rejected his request for an interview was Barry Goldwater, the former Arizona senator and presidential hopeful whose forebears sprang from Konin, but who abandoned Judaism after settling in the United States.)

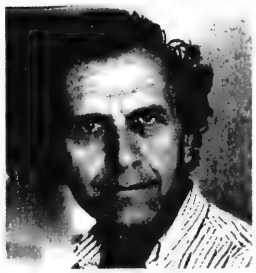
In addition, Richmond pored through archives in Israel, Poland and the United States.

And of course, he learned Yiddish, without which he could not have conducted his relentless search.

From his investigation, Richmond learned of Konin's Jewish community, its institutions, its personalities, its intricate class structure and customs and its colorful outdoor markets.

He also learned of the anti-Semitism and of the anti-Jewish boycotts organized by extreme Polish nationalists in Konin.

Konin was bombed by the German air force two days into World War II. As panic welled up, some Jews fled eastward. Others remained behind, gathering in their homes to usher in Rosh Hashanah.



Theo Richmond

Soon enough, the Nazis launched a campaign of terror against the townspeople, targeting the Jews in particular. By 1941, Konin was Judenrein, the Germans having deported all its Jews.

The Red Army swept into Konin in January 1945, expelling the Germans. In the post-war period, Konin's population swelled, reaching 80,290 in 1989, the year communism was wiped off the map in Poland.

Richmond commenced his quest without a book contract. For four years, until a publisher finally expressed an interest in his budding manuscript, he was basically on his own — subsisting on a shoestring budget (standby flights, cheap hotels and sandwiches) while earning "absolutely nothing."

His wife was a great source of support, but more importantly, he was sustained by a benefactor — "an angel" — who provided him with a substantial interest-free loan (which he has since repaid from advances).

Richmond spent a week in Konin, which, he writes, had "the feel of a provincial country town, small enough to be explored by foot, with views over meadows, fields and river."

Exploring modern Konin, which he describes as "a town of supreme ugliness," Richmond discovered that every trace of Jewish life had been expunged, and that what was left of the synagogue had been converted into a library.

Before leaving Konin, he found a monument dedicated to its former Jewish inhabitants. But it was in the Catholic cemetery and extremely hard to find.

As well, he met a woman whose mother had been Jewish but who had married a Catholic in a church ceremony and now considered herself a Christian.

By all accounts, Konin has been a hit with the critics, and in Britain it is a contender for two literary awards. Richmond reports that the book will be translated into German, Dutch and Italian and that Polish and Hebrew versions are likely.

Richmond hasn't forgotten his stay in Konin. After Konin was published, he sent a copy to Konin's library, which did not have a single volume about its Jewish past.

"My book," he said with a touch of pride in his voice, "has given them back a part of their history."

Remarkable woman portrayed in biography

Dianne Feinstein is a remarkable American woman, the first female senator from California and the former mayor of San Francisco.

Jerry Roberts, a newspaper columnist who has followed Feinstein's career for the past two decades, profiles her in Dianne Feinstein (HarperCollins, $28), a thoroughly researched book which traces the trajectory of her life from an unhappy childhood to triumphant election victories.

Born to wealth and privilege, she and her two sisters were from a seemingly picture-perfect family. Leon Goldman, her father, was a renowned surgeon. His wife, Betty Rosenberg, was a beauty of Russian Orthodox background.

The idyllic facade, however, belied turmoil. Betty, a tormented soul, was an alcoholic given to aberrant behavior. When she flew into a tantrum, she was capable of screaming racial obscenities — such as "little kike" — at her daughters.

By contrast, Leon was rock solid, a calming influence from whom Dianne drew strength and self-confidence.

Having described her formative years, Roberts goes on to sketch the details of her student days at Stanford University, her struggle as a single mother, her professional development as a lawyer and her plunge into local, state and national politics.

As biographies go, Dianne Feinstein is well worth the paper it's printed on.

Rabbi Menahem ben Solomon ha-Meiri of Perpignan

This is the second of a two-part essay about the life and work of the great scholar ha-Meiri.

By GREGG STERN

Despite its unique presentation and massive learning, Bet ha-Behirah had few readers in the centuries following its completion. Knowledge of Meiri's writings between the 14th and 18th centuries, hardly to speak of influence, is virtually nil. The first volume of Bet ha-Behirah, on tractate Megillah, does not appear until almost 300 years later, in Amsterdam, in 1769. Similarly, from the 14th until the 18th century, Meiri's magnum opus received negligible citation, and even those handful of authors who mention Bet ha-Behirah hardly make use of it. Certain isolated citations were included in two important anthologies: Shitah Mequbbetzet of Bezalel Ashkenazi (d. 1594), and Bet Yosef of Joseph Karo (d. 1575).

Guest Voices

What led to this state of affairs? Was there some nefarious action taken against Meiri's corpus? Actually, not just Meiri's writing, but a large portion of the southern French legal-interpretive legacy was submerged or disappeared during the late Middle Ages and early modern period. It seems likely that the disappearance of this legacy was affected, to a great extent, by the gradual dissolution of southern French Jewry following the expulsion of 1306.

Works like Sefer ha-Me'orot by Meir ben Simeon ha-Me'ili of Narbonne (d. 1263), Sefer ha-Mikhtam by David ben Levi of Narbonne (later 13th century), Sefer ha-Menuhah by Manoah of Narbonne (later 13th century) and Sefer ha-Battim by David ben Samuel Kokhavi [of Estella] (d. 1330) were long submerged and have come to light essentially in the 20th century.

Hebrew writing that impacts upon normative practice does not necessarily travel in an allegiant community. Sephardim at times preserve Ashkenazi works, and vice versa. Indeed, the elements of chance — or that of providence — cannot be ignored in the survival of a major work in a single copy. Nevertheless, the two great communities retain their group continuity in new regions after their geographic displacement — the Sephardim in North Africa and the Near East, the Ashkenazim in Poland, Russia, Ukraine and Balkans. Southern Jewry, on the other hand, was — after its eventual expulsion — absorbed into other Jewries that failed to save its cultural legacy from desuetude.

It seems worthy of note that the important Parma manuscript of Bet ha-Behirah (the principal source of the printed text) was produced in the Comtat Venaissin, a small protected southern French principality that maintained allegiance to the traditions of earlier generations.

How in fact did Bet ha-Behirah finally reach us? Surviving manuscripts of single tractates preserved in the great libraries — the British Museum, the Bodlican, the Vatican — when assembled, contain not even a quarter of the whole work. Without doubt, manuscripts of parts of Bet ha-Behirah were in circulation over the centuries, but they were quite rare. That even one semi-complete manuscript of the massive Bet ha-Behirah survives — thanks to the humanistic interest of the Duchessa di Parma, Maria Louise — is indeed a fortuitous occurrence.

The six-volume manuscript was produced in Avignon from 1450 to 1456 in the home of a physician named Mordechai Nathan. From Avignon, the manuscript was carried to Casale, and then to Modena. In Modena, it was examined by two scholars, who immediately recognized its importance: the Hebrew bibliographer, Hayyim Joseph Azulai (d. 1806), and the Christian Hebraist, Giovanni Bernardo de-Rossi (d. 1831). In 1793, Moses Benjamin Foa, a book collector, purchased the manuscript and took it to Reggio. At this juncture, the tomes yielded two publications: Bet ha-Behirah to tractate Shabbat (Livorno 1794), and Bet ha-Behirah to tractates Nedarim, Sotah and Nazir (Livorno 1795). In 1846, Zalman Stern, a Hungarian Jew from Rechnitz, successfully represented the Foa collection — including the manuscript of Bet ha-Bihirah — to the Palatine Library in Parma.

The Parma manuscript does not contain Bet ha-Behirah to tractate Avot, and its important introduction. Until the recent publication of the St. Petersburg manuscript (Jerusalem 1992) — out of the former collection of the Karaite scholar Abraham Firkovich — this text was available solely from the problematic Salonica edition of 1821 and its derivatives.

The question of the increased popularity of Bet ha-Behirah in the past 50 years is far more speculative. Some observers associate this popularity with a new generation of students — consumers of all types of secondary literature — who use Bet ha-Behirah for the quick and easy access to the otherwise arcane world of medieval talmudic interpretation that it uniquely affords. Perhaps Meiri's elegant lucid, smooth-flowing presentations, in a very pure Hebrew, with relative independence from talmudic terminology, have indeed been exploited as a shortcut in Talmud study by a vastly diminished generation, but perhaps some students of the Talmud have come once once again to appreciate the sensibilities that led Meiri to produce Bet ha-Behirah in the first place.

Jewish Life

Living with the tension between emet and chesed

By
RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The late Rav Yosef Dov Soloveitchik commented on a rather simple Rashi on this week's parshah, opening up a concept that is a critical one for all of us in these troubled times.

The Torah describes Moshe's approach to Pharaoh on behalf of the Jewish people and then digresses into a description of Moshe's lineage. In this description, the Torah places Aharon before Moshe — "Aharon v'Moshe." Rashi comments that throughout the Torah, you find that sometimes Moshe comes before Aharon, "Moshe v'Aharon" and sometimes Aharon is first. This is to indicate that the two of them were equal in value.

The Rav pointed out that the context of this comment of Rashi is critical. The Torah is creating a background for the leadership of both Moshe and Aharon and Rashi comments that both are equal. In leadership, the Rav pointed out, Moshe and Aharon represent two distinct approaches. Moshe represented truth and justice, while Aharon represented peace and kindness. Moshe and Aharon were both leaders of the Jewish people and their styles of leadership were equal. Sometimes the Jewish people require leaders of truth and justice, strict adherence to the law. Sometimes the Jewish people require leaders of kindness and peace.

How do you know when to exercise the leadership of Moshe and when of Aharon? In exercising leadership of strict law, of absolute adherence to the Halachah, people sometimes get hurt. The painful issues of agunah and oftentimes intermarriage are modern examples. We fully respect the Halachah and we must adhere strictly to the Halachah with full knowledge that we will not be able to relieve pain and suffering.

Moshe, Aharon represent two distinct approaches

On the other hand, when Jews come and ask that the Halachah accommodate their freedom of choice to eat non-kosher foods or violate Shabbat, as much as we want to be kind and welcoming like Aharon, clearly we must exercise halachic principles.

Emet and chesed, truth and kindness. In the Land of Israel today, we see this tension of emet and chesed. Why do some rabbinic leaders feel that the strict emet, the strictness of the mitzvah of settling the land can be relaxed, and must be relaxed, in order to avoid absolute splits in the Jewish people and for the promise of peace, while at the same time other rabbinic leaders feel that we must uphold the strictness of the mitzvah of settling the land and if the price of that mitzvah is that the Jewish people are split and suffer feelings of terrible acrimony, so be it? These are Aharon and Moshe — upholding the ideal of truth or upholding the ideal of peace.

In our own personal lives we live with this tension as well. Our commitment to our principles, to mitzvot and to our ideals sometimes brings us into conflict with others. There is a price to pay for strictness in truth. On the other hand, absolute allegiance to peace at the expense of our deeply held beliefs makes us uncomfortable with ourselves and allows us sometimes to slip into a feeling of relativism of beliefs — that what I do and believe doesn't really matter that much. Life loses its sense of urgency and ultimate meaning.

May we all as individuals and as a people be granted the wisdom to know when to be like Moshe, the upholder of truth, and when to be like Aharon, the pursuer of peace.

Genesis' tree of knowledge defines the human condition

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The 15th of this month is the holiday of Tu b'Shevat, the new year for the trees.

The Mishnah tells us there are four new years: the new year for the king, one for the animals, one for the year and one for the trees. These dates marked the interval by which to count and measure time and served to calculate the tithes for the Temple.

Today we celebrate only two of these dates, the Jewish New Year and the new year for the trees — Tu b'Shevat. Yet, if the Temple is no longer standing, why do we continue to mark this particular holiday? Perhaps the answer is connected with the significance of trees in our tradition.

The Torah is sometimes seen as the "tree of life," but there is another tree that impacted on humankind quite early, and that was the "tree of knowledge."

In the Garden of Eden, it is the fruit of this tree that Eve takes and feeds to Adam. And the breaking of the commandment not to eat from this tree leads to their exile from paradise.

The reference to the tree of knowledge of "good and evil" continuously raises questions about the nature of this knowledge. What specifically was gained through eating from this tree?

Many commentaries state that Adam and Eve were naked and the tree of knowledge taught them shame. Interestingly, one of our oldest midrashic texts, Genesis Rabbah, interprets this story differently. By a slight shifting of the verses, allowed through a grammatical "window," the midrash reads the events in the following sequence: Adam and Eve are created, they are clothed by God, they eat of the fruit, they are exiled.

In this reading, the people are not naked, which discounts the notion that the tree taught them shame. But then the question of the nature of this knowledge remains: What was gained through the forbidden fruit?

The answer may lie in the actions taken by the man and woman immediately after they have eaten — they make belts for themselves. Normally seen as an attempt to cover their nudity, these belts take on greater significance if one accepts that they were not nude.

The Bible states that God made tunics for Adam and Eve. After eating of the fruit, the people fashion belts — a completely superfluous addition. Is it possible that the tree of knowledge introduced an element of arrogance into human beings allowing them to believe they can compete with God?

Adam and Eve are already clothed and yet they attempt to "improve" on God's work by adding belts.

Perhaps the tree of knowledge defines the human condition from that time forward. Either a person possesses a healthy, cooperative relationship with God, or there is a constant struggle to compete.

By celebrating the new year of the trees, we are reminded that we must not ignore nature; nor should we neglect our role in maintaining a natural balance. Tu b'Shevat underlines the uselessness of competing with the Almighty and allows us to celebrate our position within the vastness of the created whole.

"עד רצח רבין כל הסטיקרים על המכוניות בישראל היו של הימין: שלמות הגולן, לא לזוז מהגדה וכל דומיהם. רק עכשיו, אחרי הרצח, מעזים אנשי השמאל להשמיע את דיעותיהם דרך סטיקרים". כך מסבירים לי סטודנטים ישראלים בנובמבר 1995.

"אבל מה הפריע לאנשים לחדביק סטיקרים שמאליים לפני כן" אני מתפלא. "חיית צריך לראות איזה נזקים עשו למכוניות שהודבקו עליהם סטיקרים בעלי דעות יוניות!" מסבירים לי בתגובה. פתאום הדיעה שהימין "שלט ברחוב" מקבלת משמעות מאוד אלימה, מאיימת ופאשיסטית. "מותו של רבין שינה את המציאות הזאת. זה כאילו שבאמצעות הסטיקר "שלום חבר" מגן רבין מלמעלה על מחנה השלום". ואכן הסטיקר "שלום חבר" מודבק, על פי אומדן זהיר שלי, על עשרות אלפי מכוניות, ואני, אגב, בדקתי עוד טרם שצרף "ידיעות אחרונות" סטיקרים כאלה לעיתוני יום ששי.

הכוונה בשמו של סרט ישראלי חדש זה היא כמובן ל"ליל הסדר", כפי שמבטא אותו אחד מגיבוריו הצעירים של הסרט. זהו סיפור של משפחה ישראלית, על בניה ונכדיה וניניה, שנפגשת לליל הסדר. כל האהבות, שנאות, פחדים, חשדות - הכל עולה בצורה זו או אחרת. כמו סרטים ישראלים אחרים שיצאו לאקרנים לאחרונה גם לֵילָסדָה מציג שורה מצויינת של שחקנים, החל בגילה אלמגור ויוסף שילוח הותיקים ועד לצעירים בראשית דרכם. גם פה הבעיה העיקרית לטעמי האישי היא התסריט, שבהרבה מקומות קשה להאמין לו. הג'אנר של סרטי משפחה שנפגשת לאירוע זה או אחר הינו מאוד מקובל בכל העולם, ועל כן נוצרו בתחום זה סטנדרטים מאוד גבוהים (רק תשוו ל"נשרי מדיסון" שהוצג לאחרונה). אין מה לעשות - רמה טכנית "אירופאית" איננה מספיקה! אם התסריט בלתי אמין - גם השחקנים הכי טובים בעולם לא יוכלו להושיע אותו. הכל מוכרח להתחיל בסיפור טוב. לאחרונה הלכתי לראות את וודי אלן החדש (Mighty Aphrodite) - איזה תענוג! איזה תסריט! איזה איש חכם ומצחיק! אין מה לעשות - עד שלא ילמדו לכתוב תסריט כמו שצריך לסרט ישראלי, הסרטים דוברי העברית יהיו ברובם משהוא שבין הצגת סיום של בית ספר תיכון לבין תשדיר שירות. ושלא יתפלאו מדוע הקהל בוחר ברגליו סרטים זרים.

רק ישראלי יבין:

אשה אחת שבעלה עזב אותה בלי להשאיר כתובת, מתייצבת כל שנה אצל הרב לשאול מתי יחזור בעלה. מכניס השָׂטָן את הפתק אל הרב והוא עונה: אל תדאגי, בעלך יחזור במהרה. אחרי כעשר שנים של תשובות מסוג זה יום אחד אמר השמש לאשה: "תשמעי, גברת קליבנסקי, בעלך לא יחזור!". הגיעו הדברים לאוזנו של הרב והוא כעס מאוד על השָׂטָן שלו ואמר לו: "איך יכולת לעשות דבר כל כך אכזרי בניגוד לדעתי?" ענה לו השָׂטָן: "רבי! זה ככה: אתה רואה כל שנה את הפתק אבל אני רואה את האשה..."

Budget cuts trigger talks with other communities

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto have just completed an unprecedented round of talks with other religious and ethnocultural groups on provincial budget cuts.

Planning & Allocations Director Morris Zbar addresses a recent Jewish Women's Federation forum on government budget cuts.

Congress took the initiative in organizing a series of meetings with the United, Catholic, Anglican and Seventh Day Adventist Churches and representatives from Italian, Portuguese and Chinese communities.

"That the Federation and Congress met with such a large number of organizations in such a short time," said Morris Zbar, the Federation's Director of Community Planning & Allocations, is "proof of our common concerns and their urgency. The issues were similar and the problems were similar."

The objective, according to CJC, Ontario Region Executive Director, Manuel Prutschi, was to seek common ground on the impact of drastically reduced government expenditures and develop a united approach to take to Queen's Park.

"All of the organizations expressed a concern about cuts hitting the most vulnerable members of society," he noted. "We also agreed on the importance of retaining services being delivered by individual ethno-cultural and religious communities to meet the unique needs of their members."

Both Prutschi and Zbar stressed the importance of "constructive" discussions with the government. "Our aim," explained Prutschi, "is for the government and the communities to work together as partners."

Zbar cited the importance of tax changes that would encourage increased contributions to non-profit organizations, burdened by new funding demands. "Our social safety net is breaking down," he cautioned. "We cannot replace government funding, because we don't have the taxing authority. So we need new tools to cope."

The next stage in the multicultural consultations undertaken by Congress and Federation is the creation of a joint position paper to be brought before the government within a few weeks.

Federation tells Montreal Jews

Count on our support

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is demonstrating solidarity with the Jewish community of Montreal in the wake of last year's referendum. The Federation's backing for Montreal Jewry was expressed through an open letter published in the Montreal edition of the Canadian Jewish News.

Federation President Sandra Brown was responding to a letter from her Montreal counterpart, Yoine Goldstein, president of FEDERATION CJA. Goldstein referred to "anger and discomfort" among Montreal Jews, caused by the referendum, "the conduct and rhetoric of the campaign, the uncertain results, the unfortunate remarks of exclusion by certain politicians and the threat of yet another referendum."

The letter also outlined the pride of Montreal Jewry in being both Quebecers and Canadians and FEDERATION CJA's plans to hold cross country consultations.

Brown, who believes strongly in a unified Canada, offered Goldstein help in heightening awareness about the importance of the issues Quebecers are facing.

"We, too, are committed to a dynamic future for the Jewish community in Montreal," she said. "We are committed to Jews all over the country, especially those experiencing difficulty."

In September, 1995, UJA introduced a bold, new way of looking at our campaign. The Three Year Vision.

We asked you to pledge not only for 1996, but for each of the following two years as well. We needed more financial stability and we needed more time to reach non-contributors.

Your response was heart warming. We now have a financial foundation for 1997 and 1998 to help us cope with the community's multiplying needs. And, as promised, we're reaching out to new donors.

Your generosity has helped to dignify lives burdened by poverty, rescue hundreds of thousands from troubled lands and preserve our community's much admired quality of Jewish life.

From the 1996 UJA Campaign team, to our incomparable community, thank you for sharing the vision!

Federation awards $100,000 in Jewish continuity grants

Fifteen community groups will be receiving the Federation's first Jewish continuity grants. The recipients range from the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism to Beth Jacob High School for orthodox girls (see separate stories on winning proposals).

According to Les Klein, Chairman of the Federation's Committee for Jewish Continuity, the grants, from $2500 to $25,000 reflect the community's diverse cultural, religious and social make-up.

"There are no quick fixes to ensuring Jewish continuty, said Klein, "but we're sure off to a good start."

The 19 member committee was created as a result of recommendations made in June, 1994 in a report from a task force chaired by Aaron Brotman.

Klein sees advocacy as the committee's most important role as members work to raise awareness about continuity and bring it to the forefront of the community agenda.

With a budget of $300,000 from the Federation, the Committee went to work soliciting proposals from Jewish groups seeking funding for continuity programming. By October 31, over 70 applications had been received.

May Dalume, 20, the committee's youngest member, who sat on the task force for two years, described the proposals as "stellar pitches".

"We were all pleased with the high quality and innovative style of the ideas proposed," she stressed.

"We looked for new programs and for programs that involved co-operation between groups and organizations," added Klein.

A reception for grant recipients will be held Sunday, February 4, which coincides with Tu Bishvat. The committee expects to award a second round of grants by June of this year.

The Continuity Committee consists of: Rosanne Ain, Sandra Atlin, Alan Bardikoff, Art Benjamin, Eric Bornstein, May Dalume, Shelly Duke, Ronitte Friedman, Sandra Hazan, Les Klein, Martin I. Lockshin, Anne Matlow, Pam Medjuck, Valerie Rackow, Alan Sandler, Alan Shefman, Eli Toby, Liz Wolfe and Ted Zittell.

Project promises to place Jewish content into day care

Jewish parents will soon have more choices in Jewish day care thanks to Project Sarah.

Sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and Jewish Vocational Service, Project Sarah will use a $15,000 continuity grant to recruit and train members of the Jewish community to operate day care in their homes. A similar project is currently being run in Los Angeles.

Joan Stevens of JF&CS says the idea for Jewish home day care is "rooted in today's economic situation where demand for day care far exceeds affordable supply."

"When it became clear that no new subsidies for day care would be offered, we came up with something to fill the void as much as possible," explains Stevens.

The sponsoring organizations will be establishing trainee eligibility criteria and requiring references for all trainees, but Stevens says "no experience is necessary." Professional trainers, specializing in early childhood education, will spend 12 weeks teaching potential day care workers about all apsects of Jewish day care. The ins and outs of running a day care business will also be addressed by professional business consultants.

Stevens hopes Project Sarah will allow children, from an early age, to be exposed to all aspects of Judaism.

A taste of Judaism

The Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and Kolel: Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is offering an appetizing introduction to what Jewish life is all about for those who have yet to be in touch with their own Jewish identities.

The two sponsoring organizations received the largest continuity grant of $25,000 for a program called A Taste of Judaism, aimed at unaffiliated members of the community.

Program organizer Jessie Caryll says "continuity depends on how successful the community is at reaching the unaffiliated and marginalized."

Three one week courses, beginning this spring in synagogues and community centres across the city, will be offered on spirituality, ethics and peoplehood. The classes will be small and initimate and will, according to Caryll, "teach partcipants the ABC's of Judaism and all its core values."

Downtown agencies unify for the unaffiliated

Over 15 Jewish agencies in the downtown Toronto area are combining forces for the benefit of Jewish residents in the city core.

The Downtown Jewish Community Council and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) obtained a $15,000 grant for an outreach program geared to nearly 40,000 Jews living in the area. According to BJCC Executive Director Bill Emery, only 25% of downtown Jews are being serviced by existing programs.

Emery hopes to reach "the broadest possible range" of people by using non-traditional advertising vehicles and creating innovative programming.

Last year, close to 200 people, including many University of Toronto students, attended a community seder at the BJCC. Emery expects to add new social, cultural and educational programs in 1996 to "attract diverse groups who don't associate with the broader Jewish community up north."

The Bloor JCC is a magnet for the downtown Jewish community.

Continuity grants a milestone, says Jackson

The Federation's first round of continuity grants represents a "pivotal point" in the life of Toronto's Jewish community, according to the Director of Continuity Programming, Susan Jackson.

Susan Jackson

"We've moved far beyond paying lip service to continuity," she said. "Now we're placing a premium on action."

Jackson is most impressed with the way in which individual organizations got together to develop innovative projects meeting unfilled needs. She's also impressed with the many recommendations received by the committee to reach those who are not closely connected with the community.

"Because they're not affiliated with community institutions or synagogues does not mean they're alienated from Judaism. They haven't yet discovered a means of expressing their Judaism. We want to help them through that proccess."

Jackson reminded unsuccessful applicants that a new set of grants will be awarded later this year. "We certainly don't want to dampen the enormous enthusiasm that we saw in all the applications. One message emerged very clearly; our community cares about its future. We all care enough to want to be Jewish."

Continuity grants cover "firecrackers" to genealogy

Continuity activities funded by the Federation encompass virtually every aspect of Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area. Here is a summary of Federation supported projects.

Students at Beth Jacob High School have already begun the Ashreinu/Asharsheres outreach program every Sunday for 7-12 year old Russian newcomers.

Jewish Single Parents and Friends will run a variety of adult and children's programs to provide support for single parent Jewish families.

The Zionist Youth Council will host three major youth oriented events targeted to 8-18 year olds, beginning on Tu Bishvat.

Meet Me in the Park is a series of educational and political talks sponsored by Magen David Synagogue. The weekly events, aimed at 18-30 year olds, will be held in an informal setting in Earl Bales Park.

The Good Fellowship Lodge and Jewish Camp Council of Toronto are sponsoring an Intergenerational Holocaust Program to encourage interaction between seniors and youth.

The Jewish Youth Genealogical Project, sponsored by the Jewish Genealogical Society, will develop a beginners guide to to Jewish geneaology listing Ontario geneaological sources.

Halleluya '96 is a song competition sponsored by Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Toronto Council of Hazzanim, Israel Canada Cultural Foundation and the Youth and Hechalutz Department of the Israel Youth Program Centre.

The Riverdale Jewish community is undertaking outreach programs around holiday celebrations in order to reach the unaffiliated.

Aish Hatorah is organizing a Firecrackers project for young parents with children. Programs will include children's entertainment and educational classes for adults.

Yossi Saperman, (3rd from the left) the spiritual leader of Riverdale's community synagogue, discusses the fine points of Torah with eager students.

Oy vey, it's the Yiddishland Cafe

The Hard Rock Cafe, it won't be, but the Yiddishland Cafe will offer something unavailable anywhere else in Toronto.

The monthly cabaret style shows will feature Yiddish artists performing musical concerts, comedy acts, plays and poetry readings at the Workmen's Circle Centre.

Henya Reinhart and other members of the Workmen's Circle Cultural Committee, who received a continuity grant, came up with the idea as a way of "getting the younger generation more connected with their roots."

For close to a century, the Workmen's Circle has promoted Yiddish culture and education through a variety of programs catering mostly to Toronto's large Jewish immigrant population.

According to Reinhart there are "quite a number of Yiddish performers in Toronto who have difficulty finding places to perform."

Yiddishland Cafe committee members Henya Reinhart (L) Mendl Beker and Bela Sanderson.

Windows 5756 opens new views

Diverse elements of Toronto's Jewish community will soon be getting together to exchange views about the future of the Diaspora's relationship with Israel.

The Windows 5756 conference, organized by the Mini-Moriah Committee of the Canada Israel Forum and supported by a continuity grant, is based on the continued success of the annual Moriah Conference in Israel.

Committee Chair, Sheila Arkin, says the goal of the one day conference, to be held February 11 at Baycrest Terrace, is to "positively reinforce our diverse Jewish identity through understanding and appreciation."

Arkin expects 150 participants and hopes to target youth, Israelis living in Toronto, the affliated and the non-affiliated.

If the program is a success, Arkin expects it to become an annual event. She plans to use video taped footage as an educational tool for other conferences.

Project encourages parent-teen talk

The Parent Teen Dialogue Program, supported by a $7,500 continuity grant, is a new effort being launched in 10 cities to find more opportunities for parents and teens to discuss important issues with each other.

BBYO, Bathurst Jewish Centre and Jewish Family & Child Service are looking to "fill a void in the community for dialogue between parents and teens," says BBYO Senior Regional Director, Miriam Pilc-Levine.

The dialogue will focus on a variety of programs covering topics such as stereotyping, prejudice and anti-Semitism, drinking, lashon hara (gossip), sex, drugs, intermarriage and attitudes towards Israel. "Each unit will have a Judaic component so that Jewish values can be explored", says Levine.

According to International BBYO Director, Sam Fisher, the program will "bring parents and teens a richer sense of Jewish identity that integrates family life, community and tradition."

Ashkenaz celebration lives on with AshkeTANTS

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ashkenaz lives!

So successful was Ashkenaz 95 at Harbourfront (it was attended by some 30,000), that Ashkenaz 97 is a go. Its sendoff is a benefit dance, AshkeTANTS, Jan. 27, 8.30 p.m. at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

Not only will aficionados of klezmer music put on their dancing shoes, but the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band will be augmented with Afro-Cuban percussionists to provide a beat for all forms of dance. There will also be instruction for dancing to Yiddish music.

"It's the best way to beat this January cold weather," said an enthusiastic David Buchbinder, the Ashkenaz artistic director who proved the naysayers wrong when crowds flocked to hear music, dance and drama in the Yiddish mode created by international artists.

"The time was ripe and people were intrigued by the variety of what we offered," said Buchbinder. "What I hadn't anticipated was how excited the artists themselves became when they saw the reaction. In the audience, it was a turning point in the lives of people in their 20s and 30s. Some told me it was the first time they felt completely comfortable at a Jewish event. They enjoyed a feeling of connection to their Jewishness."

Ashkenaz 97 will go ahead, whether or not the Harbourfront locale is available, he said. "I think Harbourfront will still be in existence; it's a perfect spot for Ashkenaz, but we are looking at other alternatives."

Depending on funding, Ashkenaz 97 will be accessible to all, though the 90 per cent of events that were free in '95 may not be attainable. "Ashkenaz 97 will be bigger and better than the first one," Buchbinder said. "We are counting on the community to become more involved."

The Jan. 27 dance will feature, among other performers, the talented singer Theresa Tova actor-monologuists Alon Nashman and Michael Wex as emcees.

In recreating the spirit of Ashkenaz, Nayeh Velt Cultural Initiatives, which sponsors the festival, announced an affiliation with the Bloor JCC. The two organizations will be partners in programming and audience development.

Tickets for AshkeTANTS are $25, or $15 for students and seniors. To book or for information, call the Bloor JCC at 416-924-6211

Zodiac Swim School goes to camp!!

While Zodiac's program is popular during all seasons, Zodiac's spring program (end of March until mid-June) attracts many "rookies" launching their swim careers and "veterans" looking to sharpen their skills for summer.

Zodiac's primary goal of helping its students become more confident, skilled and safe in and around the water will only enhance your child's summer experience, whether at the cottage, camp or in some other activity. During Zodiac's 17 years of operation, skill development at all levels of Red Cross, Life Saving and other specialized courses has been a central focus; building each child's self-esteem, confidence and trust, however, is equally important. Qualified and caring instructors and supervisors, together with directors Ellen and Rick Howard, work with children and parents in effectively achieving these goals.

While Zodiac will of course prepare all of its students for a great summer, children who are both students at Zodiac and campers at Green Acres Day Camp will have a special opportunity in Summer '96. Zodiac and Green Acres will be working together to bring Zodiac Swim School calibre swim lessons to the Green Acres' campers!.

For those who wish to supplement the camp or other summer experience or simply want their children to benefit from continuing swim lessons, Zodiac also offers its own terrific and unique summer program!.

Invest in your child's safety and fitness

An exciting new alternative for parents seeking a quality summer for their children is being offered by the newly opened Camp Kesher, located in the heartland of Israel, near Petach Tikvah (not far from Ben-Gurion Airport). This camp offers campers all the sports facilities and cultural activities of the typical American Camp with the added bonus of featuring Eretz Yisrael with all it's wonders and special attractions.

Camp Kesher will have weekly trips to different parts of Israel; Jerusalem, Masada, Zefat, Ein Gedi, also kayaking on the Jordan River, banana boating on the Kinneret, water parks, horseback riding, hiking and extensive touring have all been carefully planned and orchestrated to enhance your child's appreciation for this great gift Hashem has bestowed upon us when he gave us this land.

Camp Kesher is a modern orthodox, co-ed camp adhering strictly to kashrut and daily minyanim. Yeshiva kids 11-16 yrs. are welcome.

For the price of camp in the U.S., the children will be flown to Israel and given a summer (8 wk. program or 2 4 wk. sessions) of which dreams are made.

Visiting day will be at the end of the 3rd week. A charter flight will be arranged for a minimal price. Parents and siblings can take advantage of this flight and stay in Israel for 1 wk.

Green Acres offers a "swim school calibre" aquatics program

Green Acres has always been a leader in the day camp field combining creative new camp programs and concepts with first class facilities in a beautiful country setting.

Now we're leading the way again! In association with Zodiac Swim School, Green Acres swim staff will be providing a Swim School Calibre aquatics program at camp this summer. Ellen & Rick Howard, directors at Zodiac Swim School are excited about their new challenge at Green Acres.

Under the expert hands-on supervision of Zodiac Swim School professionals, our swim instruction periods will now provide continuity for the many children who participate in swim school programs year 'round. At Green Acres, campers will gain from the benefits of being able to continue with their swim progress throughout their summer at camp! In addition, the young or timid swimmer will enjoy the advantages of a sound foundation in water skills that is both fun and safe.

For the many campers who register in a swim school program in the fall, the Green Acres swim experience is an excellent opportunity to help build a child's confidence in the water. In addition, parents can now feel comfortable in the knowledge that what their children learn at camp is compatible with the teaching progressions at swim schools.

Does your pet carry more I.D. than your kids?

Children suffer millions of injuries yearly, tens of thousands are lost, yet most children carry NO means of identification to notify parents in an emergency situation.

When pets carry more I.D. than children, there is an obvious void that needs to be filled. For example, if your child was injured and unable to communicate, you and your family would go through tremendous anguish and frustration of not knowing your child's whereabouts. The ChildNet program was designed to fill this void.

The ChildNet program consists of 50 iron-on labels; once on clothing, a label cannot be lost or forgotten. In an emergency situation, the I.D. label alerts the paramedic, police officer, etc., to call ChildNet's toll-free, 24-hour North American Emergency Response Centre. As soon as a staff member has screened and verified the call, pertinent medical information is relayed to the hospital, and parents or other emergency contacts are notified.

Nowadays, children are more on the go, whether to and from school, visiting friends, at camp or on vacation. ChildNet Safety I.D. Labels offers a unique link between you and your loved ones.

ChildNet is ideal for client promotions and gifts for any occasion.

For more information on ChildNet, please call Lynne at Family Care Services, (416) 256-3074. Dealers are also welcome, ask for Ivan Greisman (905) 709-3187.

Camp Shalom, unique among camps

Camp Shalom, on beautiful Lake Muskoka at Gravenhurst, Ontario, has an established reputation as the premier Jewish residential summer camp in Muskoka.

Since its founding in 1948 by the Toronto Zionist Council - (Shalom shares its birth date with the State of Israel) - many thousands of boys and girls have, during their formative years from 8-13, experienced the joys of a fun-filled Camp Shalom summer where life-long friendships are forged and wonderful memories stored.

All this in a warmly caring environment under a well-trained staff with a 3-to-1 staff to camper ratio. A doctor and a nurse are on site at all times.

As a non-political, non-profit Zionist camp affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea and accredited by the Ontario Camping Association, Camp Shalom imbues its campers with a sense of Jewish history, Jewish cultural values and the centrality of Israel in their lives. The special Camp Shalom "ruach" (spirit) creates an ambience which encourages the ideals of sharing, mutual respect and fair play.

Camp Shalom is unique among camps in its individualized program wherein each camper may choose his/her own special interests from among some 18 daily activities which include canoe, sailing, ropes, baseball, tennis, instructional swim, waterskiing, Jewish cooking, drama, arts & crafts, journalism, tripping, photography, Israeli singing and Israeli dance.

Abe Levy of Levy's Glatt Kosher Catering will return for his 3rd season to again produce his outstanding "I can't believe it's camp food" meals and snacks. (Parents and visitors on Shalom's visitors days recall a taste of Abe's superb cuisine.)

The Toronto Zionist Council is committed to maintaining the lowest possible fee structure for Camp Shalom, in order to make Shalom accessible to as many youngsters as possible, while at the same time continuing in the Camp Shalom tradition of excellence, both in program and in physical maintenance.

"We look forward to the summer of '96 and the privilege of sharing another wonderful Camp Shalom experience with the '96 lucky contingent of campers," says Yacov Gabel, director, and Malka Klein, Administrator.

Camp Ramah inspires today's youth

Camp Ramah, located on Skeleton Lake offers a quality camping program in the framework of traditional Jewish practice. Under the directorship of Rabbi Mitch Cohen, Ramah offers the total camping experience for children in grades 3-10. Our safe and comprehensive waterfront program staffed by certified instructors is a highlight for our campers. Sports is an integral part of every camper's development, focusing on skills, teamwork, and sportsmanship. Arts activities allow each camper to realize their creative potential through projects, performances, and individualized instruction. Outdoors programs take full advantage of the camp's beautiful setting while raising our camper's environmental awareness. A new ropes course gives campers and staff a chance to work together towards shared goals.

Judaica, Hebrew, and Israel programming are a regular part of the camp day. Jewish texts are taught by young adults in an informal setting. Hebrew is spoken, heard and often becomes second nature at camp. Shabbat, prayer, and ritual observance assume special qualities when experienced and shared with friends.

Ramah now offers a unique one month program for campers with special needs. The Tikvah ("Hope") program gives adolescents ages 12 and up an opportunity to enjoy everything about camp while defining their own Jewish identity.

Staff are often former campers who return to Ramah because of the deep-rooted commitment to the Ramah environment. Young people develop skills and leadership, enduring friendships and a Jewish consciousness that helps them become vibrant members of their family and home community..

Only at Moshava

Situated in the scenic Kawartha Lakes region of central Ontario, Camp Moshava provides a full range of sports activities, swimming, boating, hiking, nature study, arts & crafts, drama, shira, and special programs and events.

Over the years, the camp has built some new buildings, developed some new programs, and put in enough water pipe to service a small city.

But the real things that make camp what it is, haven't changed much.

We still assemble and train a staff of exceptional young men and women to work with our campers in a warm, supportive Orthodox Zionist environment. We still see our goal as fostering a commitment to the B'nei Akiva principles of love of G-d, love of Torah, and love of Israel. What is really unique, really important about Camp Moshava, goes beyond facilities and events and personalities. And that won't ever change because we won't let it change.

To learn more about Camp Moshava and what it has to offer you, please join us for an informational session in Toronto on January 21 at Yeshivat Or Chaim, or in Montreal on February 18 at the Hebrew Academy (or both!!). And don't think winter isn't the right time to plan your child's summer. It's always a good time to think summer ... and think Camp Moshava.

Israel camp for girls fosters individual growth

Overnight camps have long been recognized as an excellent supplement to a year-round Torah education. Camping fosters varied opportunities for individual growth. Group living, independence, formal as well as informal learning, song, dance, drama, swimming, etc. are just some of the benefits offered in this natural surrounding

But ... a new dimension has been added at N'Vei Ashdod. For the past 12 years N'Vei Ashdod has provided all these things, and more ... in Eretz Yisrael where everything takes on a special flavour.

Lively, frum girls from all over the world come to Camp N'Vei Ashdod and forge lifelong friendships. It is indeed rare to find so many girls from so many places, blending so naturally. Perhaps it is the love for Eretz Yisrael which brings them so close together.

Situated in beautiful central Israel, in a tranquil, fully enclosed, modern campus with an enormous pool and beautiful grounds, N'Vei Ashdod combines learning, sports, fun and excitement with extensive touring throughout Israel.

The girls travel across the country in air-conditioned buses with the finest tour guides available. The whole time, security is top priority.

Shabbos, whether in camp or outside, is particularly special; picture Shabbos in the old city of Jerusalem, or in the Ir HaKodesh of Tzfat, guest lectures, Talmidei Chachomim, authors and well known Torah personalities add an extra dimension to the Israel experience.

N'Vei Ashdod, the touring camp for girls ages 10-17 in Israel is now in its 12th summer.

Shendy's brings aquatics to camp

Swimming is a total-fitness exercise which sets the whole body in motion, including the heart. Moreover, it is a vital part of enjoying life at camp.

To enjoy swimming, fitness and safety are essential; so Eric Shendelman of Shendy's Swim School "brings aquatics to camp." Shendelman, who teaches for York Region, has been in aquatics for 13 years, and has 16 years experience in camping, including positions as camp and program director.

He attributes Shendy's success to his well-trained, experienced instructors. Because the child's learning depends on personal attention, and treating parents as partners, he and his staff are always approachable both to parents and children.

Though Shendy's emphasizes fitness and safety, there are courses in competitive swimming. Also, there are adult programs available. Many of these programs have helped children and adults overcome fear of water.

Instructors have Red Cross and Royal Life Saving certificates, and regular training updates including summer camp recertification. Shendy's also trains instructors for other camps and schools. Advanced leadership courses include Red Cross and Royal Life Saving Instructors, National Life Guard Award, Bronze courses, CPR and aquatic emergency care.

In the fall, Shendy's will switch to the new AquaQuest system. Shendelman is training his instructors in AquaQuest now, and from spring on, will offer the new Aqua-Leaders' program to children 14 and over.

Shendy's Swim School is a commercial member of the Ontario Camping Association. For more information, please call Eric Shendelman at (416) 784-0900.

Kinneret's "First-Timers" eases transition to summer camping

Camp Kinneret (formerly Hagshama) has been a landmark of Jewish summer camping for over forty years. Thousands have spent their summers on the shores of beautiful Lac Mercier, near Mont Tremblant, where they have made lifetime friendships. Kinneret offers the full range of summer camp activities such as land and water sports, swim instruction, arts and crafts, drama, nature lore, jazz dance, newspaper, canoe tripping and much more.

What sets Kinneret apart, first of all, is it's small size which ensures a warm, family-like environment. Every camper receives individualized attention not only from the counsellors, but from everyone right up to the director. In addition, Kinneret does not just pay lip service to the idea of Jewish summer camping. Through the general ambience and through fun, informal programs, the camp reinforces pride in their Jewish heritage, with Israel as a focus. Last, but not least, Young Judaea activities in the city mean year-round continuity for those who want more than just a summer experience.

To ease the transition to summer camping for first-time campers, Kinneret runs a "Rishonim" (first-timers) program. Campers, aged 7 to 9, come for a week (July 28-August 5), during which they have their own staff and their own tailor-made program, but are integrated into the daily flow of camp life. Call the director, Tina Ornstein, at the camp office (735-3167 in Montreal or 1-800-426-5108) for more information today.

Come help us celebrate our 50th anniversary. We are planning several outstanding events. Start by touring Toronto at Spring Break or Passover Camp. The excitement continues with our traditional 8 week summer program for campers from 4 to 14 years that is well rounded, designed to meet the needs of all campers, and is most importantly FUN. Our campers enjoy swimming, in 4 heated pools, twice daily with qualified Instructors. Other activities include: canoeing, computers, archery, photography, music, drama, arts and crafts, nature, ropes, dance, sports, hiking and fishing. We provide an active and safe program by maintaining a 1 to 4 ratio of program staff to campers. Our counselling staff are at least 17 years of age. Proof of our success is the 75-80 % return rate of both campers and staff.

Experience Israel with Maccabi (Formerly Masada)

Imagine taking 43 teenagers from all over the United States and having them spend an entire 5½ weeks of their summer in Israel.

The possibilities are endless. However, Maccabi Israel Summer Programs (formerly Masada) manages to unite us all together as one. It is obvious that our time here in Israel will be the most amazing summer of our lives.

Even for people, like ourselves, that came not knowing a single person, just being in Israel gives you a sense of belonging. We all came from different backgrounds, but there is one thing that we all have in common: the fact that we are Jewish.

We all practice our Judaism in different ways, but the same beliefs and values remain inside each and every one of us.

In fact, being in Israel so far (half the trip has flown by) has already strengthened our Jewish identity.

We are looking forward to more fun and exciting times to come during the course of our summer. Our experiences in Israel will definitely have a large impact on our lives. The friendships and memories we have already made are certain to continue and last a lifetime.

Creativity at Kidsworld

Kidsworld is in its 16th year of quality camping. Parents have been choosing Kidsworld for its creative programming for all these years.

Careful thought and much creativity go into the program. Every day something special is happening at the camp, from theme days to carnivals, olympics, professional entertainers and more. Specialty staff are hired to create unique activities in the areas of music, drama, art, kindergym and sports. Both fine and gross motor skills are developed throughout the summer.

Instructional swimming is one of the most important parts of the day. The campers are carefully supervised and they are taught the various skills for the Red Cross swim program.

Mrs. Rochelle Weinberg has directed the camp since its inception. She holds a Master of Education degree, an early childhood education diploma and has taught for 20 years.

She chooses only the most qualified staff through a careful screening process. This wonderful staff is one of the reasons the camp is so popular among parents. "MID-TOWN JEWEL"

Crestwood Valley Day Camp, located in a beautiful wooded valley at Bayview and Lawrence Avenues, brings children ages 2 1/2—10 close to nature while providing them with the comforts of home.

"We are fortunate to have such a fabulous site located right in the middle of town," says camp director Rochelle Wise.

Campers are encouraged to explore the valley in which the camp is located. Camper's are also introduced to nature through experience on the camp's own miniature farm, which features a vegetable garden and many animals including pigs, ducks, chickens and rabbits. "Our campers enjoy visiting the farm," says Wise. "It is exciting for the younger campers for whom the animals become such special friends."

The camp experience at Crestwood includes supervised arts and crafts (featuring a full pottery program), drama, dance, performance art, puppetry and various athletic activities. Pre-schoolers are offered a full sports program including T-Ball, soccer and co-operative games, helping them develop hand-eye co-ordination and motor skills. An exciting archery program is always a favourite of the children. Tennis is available to older campers.

Crestwood has a "very professional swim program. We overhire qualified swim staff," Wise says, "because we want to ensure that our campers have the best swim instructors available, with small instructor-camper ratios." Crestwood has 5 heated swimming pools on site, and has use of the olympic-sized pool at nearby Glendon College.

The computer Clinic is a favourite at Crestwood challenging campers with innovative programs.

Crestwood's Baseball Training Camp encourages campers who have completed Grade 1 and up to take part in an intensive program focusing on the development of skills and confidence, coached by experienced instructors. Campers in this program enjoy baseball in the mornings and join the rest of the camp for regular activities for the afternoon.

Campers are encouraged to participate in an in-camp overnight which features a cook-out and a traditional campfire and sing-a-long.

Crestwood also introduces its campers to the joys of camping out. Campers completing Grade 2 and up have the option of participating in a 4-day trip to an overnight camp.

Campers never long for the conveniences of home while they experience the great outdoors. They are provided with convenient door-to-door transportation and are served full catered nutritional lunches. Crestwood's air-conditioned rooms and gymnasium are available for inclement weather.

Wise adds that campers revel in "the cozy, family atmosphere" of Crestwood. "Our (180) staff members are very close, and very spirited, building lasting memories for our children."

TEEN TRAVEL

TEEN ISRAEL PROGRAMS -- A WONDERFUL ALTERNATIVE TO CAMP!!

Israel offers a wide variety of summer programs for students from 13 years of age to 24 yrs. The options range from a two week to a six week tour that includes different activities and programs.

For first-time and seasoned travelers to Israel, an organized tour is often the answer. This enables the student to experience Israel without worrying about the little details. Food, travel and hotels are all arranged. All the student has to do is sit back, make new friends, and see a country where the old is intermingled with the new.

Climb the snake path at Masada, visit the ancient ruins of Caesaria, kayak down the Jordan river, windsurf in Eilat.

There are several ways to find out about the summer programs. One is to call 1-800-567-ISRAEL. This line was established by the Canadian Alliance for the Israel Experience. The main purpose of the Alliance is to encourage teen travel to Israel by promoting the Israel Experience. Callers receive a package of materials explaining the various suitable trip options and who to contact for further information.

It's important to know that The Teen Israel Hotline receives no commission on travel packages sold, and has no direct affiliation with any one group or synagogue, so you can be sure you'll get helpful, unbiased information. Explains Roberta Malam, Program Director of the Hotline, "I get calls from people in all parts of Canada, who are interested in getting information about all kinds of programs. Families may be interested in travel programs suitable for the entire family, especially if they have a son or daughter of Bar or Bat Mitzvoh age. We also get calls from teens themselves, who like being able to source out the information on their own."

The Hotline typically handles several calls each day. Around this time of the year, many of the calls are from parents as well as teens looking for a different, more meaningful way to spend the summer.

Teens often return from a Teen Israel program with a greater sense of who they are -- as individuals and as Jews. In many cases, simply being in a country where Jewish culture is everywhere is a deeply moving experience. And this happens whether the program emphasizes religious studies, outdoor sports, or archeology. Invariably, one of the high points for teens going to Israel is the chance to meet new friends from all over the world. Once again, the experience of meeting other teens who come from vastly different backgrounds, but all sharing a common heritage, is deeply moving. In some cases, the friendships that result from these experiences last long after everyone returns to home. One Israel trip participant, age 16, is emphatic about her experience; "There is something about Israel that just made me feel good about myself, about my history, and even about my own abilities."

In addition to the Hotline, students can receive information by contacting their local Israel Youth Program Centres. The national office is run by the Youth and Hechalutz Department in the Canadian Zionist Federation. Their number is: (514) 486-9526 ext.222.

Hall of Fame player seeks marrow donor for daughter

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prominent athletes don't always have it all.

Rod Carew, a hall of fame baseball player and now coach of the California Angels, is praying for a bone marrow transplant for his daughter, Michelle.

Since September, 18-year old Michelle Carew, a lively, outgoing college freshman, has fought a valiant battle against acute nonlymphocytic leukemia, a particularly virulent form of the disease. Only a bone marrow transplant can save her.

Rose Rosa, a Toronto music producer and artists' manager, a long-time friend of the Carews, has brought Michelle's story here because, as she told Marty York of the Globe and Mail, "Toronto has been full of big hearts and we've always been quick to run and help people."

As well, she told The CJN, it was felt that with Toronto's large multicultural population, there would be a good chance of finding a match for her.

Rod Carew is of Panamanian and West Indian descent, while his wife, Marilynn, is of Ukrainian and Jewish background.

Those of mixed race, and especially of minority groups (such as black, native Canadian or Jewish) have a particularly difficult time finding bone marrow donors.

Not only are there fewer of them in the general population, but they tend to be proportionately underrepresented in the international bone marrow registries.

A follow-up story in last Thursday's Globe, said that nearly 200 Canadians, many of similar backgrounds to Michelle Carew, offered to be tested as possible donors for her.

As has been said frequently in The CJN, the best chance for a bone marrow donor, comes from the immediate family. In Michelle's case, neither her parents nor her sisters, are compatible with her. As so often is the case, her sisters are perfect matches for each other.

The next best scenario is for someone of similar ethnic or racial background. Rosa is encouraging those of Jewish, Panamanian, West Indian or Ukrainian descent to come and be tested.

Toronto's Jewish community has a history of coming forward in aid of those who need bone marrow transplants, most notably for Jay Feinberg and the late Allison Atlas. Feinberg received a transplant late last summer from someone who had been tested at a mass screening.

Michelle Carew is no less needy — she is in an air-filtered sterile room in an intensive care unit of Children's Hospital in Orange, California. Last week, she was scheduled for surgery to deal with a sinus infection affecting her hearing and eyesight.

Rosa is planning a mass screening sometime in the next few weeks.

In the meantime, to be tested as a possible bone marrow donor for Michelle Carew, or for the many other people who are in need, contact the Canadian Red Cross bone marrow registry at 1-800-668-2866 or Rose Rosa, 905-430-5995.

Kofsky's passionate devotion to Labor Zionism remembered

MONTREAL — David Kofsky, one of Labor Zionism's staunchest exponents, passed away recently after a brief illness. He was 81.

Kofsky served as national president of the Labor Zionist Alliance (LZA) from 1977-92. During that time, he was instrumental in developing the organization as a distinct entity from the movement in the United States.

"He devoted his whole life to the cause," recalled Flora Naglie, former president of Na'amat, the women's arm of Labor Zionism. "He believed in the ideology passionately and defended it with an emotion you rarely see among people nowadays."

Kofsky made his living retailing clothing. After his retirement, he came to the LZA office almost every day, said LZA Montreal director Reuven Shultz, almost up until the time he died.

Schultz credits Kofsky with "keeping the organization together" through some difficult periods because of his skillful leadership.

Kofsky is also remembered for his personal qualities. "He was high-principled, a perfect gentleman with a great appreciation of culture and learning," Shultz recalled. "He had an excellent command of language and a good grasp of history."

Kofsky was born in Russia and came to Canada as a child. His father was a Hebrew teacher and worked initially in Quebec City, before the family settled in Montreal.

His parents were dedicated to socialist ideals, and the young Kofsky followed in this tradition from his youth, joining Habonim at an early age, Shultz said. Before World War II, Kofsky went to the United States to work on a cooperative farm that prepared Zionists for life in Palestine.

Shultz said it appeared Kofsky intended to emigrate, but could not get a visa and returned to Montreal.

Kofsky is survived by his wife Tamar Weinstein, among other relatives.

Markham mayor planning a working trip to Israel

MARKHAM, Ont. — Markham Mayor Don Cousens, a long-time friend of the Jewish community, is headed to Israel in March for a mayors' conference.

And just before he leaves, the town will name a street after Jerusalem, in honor of the city's 3,000th anniversary.

The street will be in a new development in the Bayview-Green Lane area.

As well, Markham is looking to link up with a similar-sized Israel town to explore what Cousens calls "an economic alliance" and not a formal twinning.

Cousens told The CJN that Israeli Consul General Jehudi Kinar is talking to a town in the Galilee for the possible linkage.

The conference of mayors from around the world takes place March 18 to 25, but Cousens and York Regional Councillor Bill Fisch will leave before it starts, along with a team of business people from the greater Toronto area.

They'll be selling Canadian know-how and exploring joint deals with Israeli firms, especially in the area of high technology.

Don Cousens

Cousens told The CJN he was invited to the mayors' meeting by Jersualem Mayor Ehud Olmert when he last visited Canada.

The Markham mayor was awarded the Canadian Zionist Federation's Jerusalem Award a few years ago primarily for his efforts on behalf of Soviet Jewry when he was an MPP.

"I'm so excited about this, you wouldn't believe it," Cousens said of the trip.

Critics assail climate of rhetoric in Canada to me and said, 'Give me a gun and I'll take care of Rabin and [then foreign minister Shimon] Peres.' It was talk, but it represented a sentiment."

Halevi said he knows of no Jewish organizations in Canada, including those that oppose giving land for peace, that supported Rabin's murder.

Kach, which became defunct in Canada after Dr. Baruch Goldstein's shooting rampage in a Hebron mosque, did not endorse the Jewish doctor's shooting either, he said.

Nevertheless, Halevi claimed, "There was incredible support for Goldstein from lots of people in Toronto," including religious leaders.

And showing again that Toronto has ties to the more militant elements in the Jewish world, Halevi said he knew of 10 youths who attended a paramilitary camp in upstate New York two year ago that was organized by Kahane Chai. Two of the 10 later moved to Israel.

Bernie Farber, director of Canadian Jewish Congress' community relations committee, acknowledged there were some individuals in Canada with ties to extremist groups. But, he added, "I'm not sure there is a major problem here.

"I don't think Canada is a significant base of extremist activity. Within the Jewish community, there is very little to indicate there's much activity ... I have not heard much rhetoric here in Canada that Rabin should have been killed."

In Montreal, David Sultan, director of community relations for Congress' Quebec region, and others were unanimous in their assessment that there is no evidence of any organized extreme-right activity in the community.

"In Quebec, there's nothing like that," Sultan said. "Just expressions of differing opinions."

Still, divergent views emerged as to how the climate of rhetoric has been affected since Rabin's assassination.

> 'Our leadership has not taken a very deep look inward...'

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who is often identified with the "right" and has helped Yesha (the organization representing settlers in Judea, Samaria and Gaza) organize "humanitarian" fundraising in Montreal, detects "a very strong current of skepticism" about the peace process.

At the same time, such dissent, in his view, has "never been as charged here as elsewhere."

It is true, he said, that since the assassination, "everyone, left and right, has taken a step back to carefully dissect language and rhetoric."

But "I'm very proud that the nationalist camp has conducted its dissent within the community.

"The tone has been civil."

That view was not necessarily shared by Dr. Frank Guttman, long active in Montreal with Canadian Friends of Peace Now, who claimed rhetoric had bordered on the "extreme."

Guttman said that while the level of rhetoric has "toned down" since the assassination the most-often heard voices in the community still come from "self-appointed leaders who have been pro-Likud" and who seek to create the impression that most Montreal Jews are against the peace process.

In Guttman's mind, a scientific survey of the community would reveal support for the process at 70 per cent, in line with the level in the United States.

Reuven Schultz, executive director of the Labor Zionist Alliance, said the level of charged rhetoric in Montreal has definitely softened since the assassination, if not necessarily attitudes about the peace process itself.

"Last March, in the Cavendish Mall, I heard someone say, 'Kill Rabin.' Now, I think people have become more cognitive and prudent about what rhetoric can mean," he said.

Former Congress president Irving Abella said anyone engaging in provocative rhetoric connected to the Rabin assassination should be exposed and shunned by mainstream community organizations.

A disturbing trend had developed in Toronto before the assassination; Rabin was vilified and the peace process attacked, he said. In addition, Congress meetings and meetings of other pro-Israel groups were disrupted by opponents of the peace process "and the community didn't react."

Simon Rosenblum, co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, recalls that "on occasion [people] have come and tried to disrupt our activities in the last year."

Prior to one banquet, demonstrators tried to hinder the arrival of guests by blocking traffic, while at another event two years ago cosponsored with Congress, "they were there trying to disrupt the meeting."

The slogans being shouted indicated their views were those of the extreme right, Rosenblum said.

"Parts of the right had escalated the language here in Toronto" and "you could hear from time to time the word 'traitor.' " The assassination has made everyong "walk on eggshells" and the rhetoric has toned down, he said.

Rosenblum suggested that both the left and the right have in the past used excessive rhetoric, indicating a lack of respect for opposing viewpoints.

Peace Now had hoped to cosponsor a town hall meeting with the Jewish Action Coalition, which supports settlers in Judea and Samaria, to "find common Zionist ground and develop respect for each other's views," Rosenblum added.

Former Congress official David Satok believes "both lay and religious leadership have not done enough in the past to condemn the vitriolic debate about the peace process.

"Our leadership has not taken a very deep look inward to see how they were partially responsible; [nor did they] delegitimate those who called Rabin and Peres traitors and murderers. The climate of verbal violence and violent language leads to violent acts, as we have witnessed."

He referred to Congress, where he held significant positions on the national and regional levels, as failing to discuss a resolution that would have called for civility in public discourse and for allowing right-wing groups to set the agenda on Israel and the peace process.

He pointed to B'nai Brith Canada, which "for all practical purposes has turned into a branch of Likud Canada" for publishing in The Tribune a "cartoon of Rabin as a dressed-up gauleiter overseeing a concentration camp of settlers."

Abella echoed that critique, saying, "That was the sort of thing that was beyond the pale for the mainstream Jewish community."

Satok also criticized The Canadian Jewish News for giving "copious publicity to anti-Israel demonstrations and right-wing speakers."

Yesha "polarized the community by their meetings which consisted of diatribes against Rabin and the Israeli government," Satok added.

The heartache of Alzheimer's is no joke

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — You've all heard the jokes.

"I can't find my keys — I must have Alzheimer's."

"You forgot her name? You must have Alzheimer's."

Alzheimer's disease, though, is no joke. For about 20 per cent of people over 80, a percentage which rises every five years after age 65, it robs its victims of a happy old age, of dignity, of independence, of years of life itself.

It takes its toll in money, health and emotional peace on those who love and those who care. It breaks families apart.

Alzheimer's disease is a progressive neurodegenerative disease of the brain, the most common cause of dementia in the aged, Dr. Morris Friedman, director of behavioral neurology at Baycrest Hospital, told The CJN.

It usually begins with memory loss, progresses to language impairment, empty speech (speech without content) and difficulties with orientation and visual perception.

In the early stages, the personality does not change, Friedman said, a finding which differentiates Alzheimer's from other forms of dementia.

The person has trouble organizing information and focussing attention. Ultimately, he or she may begin to wander or may become aggressive. Cognitive impairment worsens, until the person can no longer function independently, eventually requiring total care.

While Alzheimer's disease is not in itself fatal, death comes from other complications, such as pneumonia.

"The average life span is about eight years after onset," Friedman said.

There is no way to determine who will get Alzheimer's disease, although recent research suggests a genetic component, and possibly some relationship with aluminum.

A new drug, Tacrine, recently approved for use in the United States, appears to give some temporary improvement, but it has serious side effects and requires close monitoring.

But for now, the bottom line is chilling in its simplicity: there is no prevention and there is no cure.

Institutions like Baycrest and organizations like Senior Care offer many services to Alzheimer's sufferers and their families, including assessment, symptom treatment and advice, and different kinds of support and care at different stages of the disease.

Margaret MacAdam, senior vice-president for social services at Baycrest, said families need help planning for the future. "They realize that this is not a short-term illness, but one that could unfold over a number of years."

The Samuel Lunenfeld Special Day Care centre offers a variety of programs, including fitness, reminiscence groups, arts and crafts, music and supervised outings.

The Frank and Vilma Martin Respite Program allows Alzheimer's patients to stay in Baycrest for a week or a month, so that the caregivers can go on vacation or to a simchah.

"It is a welcome relief," MacAdam said.

January is Alzheimer's disease month. At least for a while, let's skip the jokes.

Baycrest lab technologist Judy Sulev uses a glucometer to measure the blood-sugar level of Sam Romberg of the Royal Canadian Legion, General Wingate Lodge. Looking on is Lodge member Al Labovitch.

Diabetes is a 'self-help' disease

TORONTO — It is quite common for people to develop diabetes in their later years. In fact, mature-onset diabetes affects more than 10 per cent of people over age 65.

The bad news about diabetes is that if left untreated, it can seriously threaten health and well-being. The good news is that, although living with diabetes can be challenging, it is a "self-help" disease — which means you can take control of the situation and continue to lead an active and enjoyable life.

The health experts at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care say the most effective way to deal with diabetes is to maintain a healthy diet, visit your doctor regularly and ensure your blood-sugar levels are at a healthy level. This is done by testing a drop of your blood with a small machine called a glucometer, or blood-sugar meter.

The General Wingate Lodge of the Royal Canadian Legion has helped Baycrest diabetes patients by donating funds toward the purchase of glucometers.

"We depend on community support, like that of the lodge, to help us meet our patients' needs," says Judy Sulev, a lab technologist at Baycrest. "We are very grateful for their contribution."

Christopher optimistic about Israel/Syria talks

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher last week expressed pleasure with the "very good progress" made during his meetings with Israeli and Syrian leaders.

After conferring with Prime Minister Shimon Peres in Jerusalem, Christopher announced that the Syrians had agreed to broaden the scope of the talks by bringing in a senior military adviser, but not the chiefs of staff.

Israel Radio reported that IDF Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan would be joining the Israeli negotiating team.

"Experts will be added where necessary," he said, when asked by reporters why the Syrians had not agreed to include economic or water experts. "Now it's time to discuss the military field."

Christopher said that "the challenges cannot be minimized" but expressed hope the leaders of both countries would "do everything possible to achieve peace this year.

"I am optimistic and hopeful," he said, noting that Israel and Syria have reached "a more meaningful dialogue." He added that the United States "would be there at key points ...to help." Christopher repeated his statement, made in Damascus last Friday, that "a new threshold had been crossed" and said the talks will resume in Maryland.

"This visit [of Christopher] moved things ahead and things are moving. It's very important progress," Peres said.

"We have a partner for peace talks," Peres said, "But there is a long list of weighty issues" still to be discussed. As for the time factor, Peres said: "Our major concern is not the speed of the negotiations but the content, which will have to face the test of time."

In Damascus, Christopher had said Hafez al-Assad had agreed to continuing secluded talks by a "core group" of negotiators in Wye Plantation in Maryland, combined with periodic visits by Christopher himself to the Middle East to confer with Israeli and Syrian leaders.

Last Saturday night, Peres said that for the first time there is a chance to discuss normalization with the Syrians and to raise the possibility of a comprehensive peace in the region.

He said that for five months the Syrians had not agreed to add a military expert to the delegations.

"There is a change for the better," he said. But he stressed that not all the outstanding issues had been resolved.

Foreign Minister Ehud Barak, who met earlier with Christopher, said that only after Christopher's next visit to the region would it become clear if Syria is "a partner for peace," and that patience was required to resolve a 50-year-long dispute.

The negotiations should not be tied to the date of the elections in Israel or the United States, he added.

Canada boosts aid package

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Canada is donating $70 million in aid to Palestinians over the next five years.

The sum is an increase over the $55 million over five years that Canada pledged in 1993 as part of the international aid package to Palestinians in the territories.

It's part of a promise of $1.76 billion in aid announced last week by 50 donor countries and organizations, in the days leading to the first Palestinian elections, scheduled for Jan. 20.

Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet said the money will help improve conditions in the West Bank and Gaza, which in turn, will help secure peace.

Canada's donation will be used mainly to help resettle refugees, improve education and health care and help rebuild the infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza.

So far, $27 million of Canada's donation has already been given to the Palestinians.

Of the new amount, $3 million will go the Palestinian Authority's so-called "peace fund," which helps pay for salaries and equipment as well as a clean-up program in Gaza, while $2.5 million will go toward building and repairing sewers and water works.

The pledges surpassed PLO leader Yasser Arafat's hopes for assistance and reinforced his political stature prior to the elections.

At a one-day conference last Tuesday, donor countries and organizations also promised to pay an additional $500 million in funds previously committed, but not yet paid.

The total package will be disbursed between now and March 1997.

Monitoring team announced

OTTAWA — Canada is sending an 11-member team to monitor the Jan. 20 Palestinian elections.

The team includes five Liberal members of Parliament: Carolyn Parrish, Colleen Beaumier, Ovid Jackson, Roger Gallaway and Shaughnessy Cohen.

The others are Michael Lynk, an Ottawa lawyer who has been a human rights observer in the territories; Baghat Korany, a political scientist and Mideast specialist at the University of Montreal; Suehila el-Kateb, a coordinator for the International Development and Refugee Foundation; Michael Shenstone, an Arabist and former Canadian ambassador to several Mideast countries, his wife Susan and their daughter Barbara, who works for CARE Canada and is an expert in election monitoring.

They will be augmented on election day by the staff of Canada's embassy in Israel, as well as by Judy Thompson, described as a "technical adviser."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our second annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings of the pageantry and the drama of the story of Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different contestants in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN Purim issue. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a prize worth $25.00.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be smaller than 5 by 7 inches. Please paint, draw, or color bright, colorful, evocative art. You can draw on any paper you wish, but keep in mind we are looking for pictures which will show bright colors well. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.

Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5:00 pm on Monday, Feb.19, 1996.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication. The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing, and the way it tells part of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, Feb. 23, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning pictures will be published in The CJN of Feb. 29, 1996. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Iraq battered but Saddam still rules

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Iraq marks the fifth anniversary of the Gulf War this week, a battered outlaw nation whose ruthless leader, Saddam Hussein, reigns supreme.

Despite crippling United Nations economic sanctions which have brought misery, malnutrition and national humiliation, and in spite of the embarrassing defection of his two top aides last August, Hussein appears in full command of the one-party regime he has presided over since 1979.

Since his accession to power, he has led Iraq into two major misadventures.

In 1980, he dragged Iraq into an eight-year war with Iran which ended in a stalemate, claimed the lives of 105,000 Iraqis, caused widespread property damage, forced the cancellation of ambitious development projects and plunged the country into debt to the tune of $80 billion.

Barely having recovered from this calamity, Iraq invaded, then annexed, Kuwait, whose oil fields he coveted. Hussein's ill-conceived brinkmanship triggered a war which pitted an essentially Third World country against a powerful coalition of combatants spearheaded by the United States.

For Iraq, the Gulf War — "the mother of all battles," as Hussein flippantly put it — was an unequivocable catastrophe. It left much of Iraq's armed forces in ruins and devastated its industrial infrastructure. It wreaked havoc on its people and sparked civil insurrection in the guise of Kurdish and Shi'ite rebellions. It buried the idea of Arab nationalism. (It also reinvigorated the Arab-Israeli peace process.)

The outcome of the Gulf War should have driven Hussein and his cohorts out of Iraq in disgrace. But Hussein, a strong-willed survivor who has never been loath to purge and kill rivals, prevailed over adversity.

He remains firmly entrenched for a number of reasons. He controls the Ba'athist party, the armed forces and the security apparatus. The opposition is in disarray, unable even to agree on a common program of action. And Hussein successfully portrays himself as the guarantor of Iraq's honor and unity.

By clever manipulation and constant repetition, Hussein has shifted the blame for the UN embargo to the West, while convincing most Iraqis that without him at the helm Iraq would be partitioned by its hostile nighbors.

With Western no-fly zones in the north and in the south off-limits to Iraqi aircraft, Iraq effectively has been carved up. But the regime has used this loss of sovereignty to its advantage, harping on the theme that Hussein is a bulwark against Iraq's wholesale disintegration.

That message has not fallen on deaf ears. Last October, shortly after the United States once again accused Iraq of massing troops menacingly close to Kuwait's border and dispatched troops to the region as a deterrent, Iraqis in a referendum re-elected Hussein as president.

The margin of victory — 99.9 per cent — was, of course, implausible. What can one expect in a police state where fear permeates the political culture? But even when this factor is included in the equation, the average Iraqi has been brainwashed to believe that there is no viable alternative to Hussein.

A Sunni Muslim of humble rural origins, Hussein was born in the village of Takrit in 1937. Raised in the home of an uncle who participated in the 1941 Rashid Ali uprising against the British, Hussein became a member of the Ba'ath party when he was 20.

When the first Ba'athist government was overthrown in 1964 after only a year, Hussein was arrested, spending two years in jail before escaping. Not long afterward, he was appointed secretary-general of the Ba'ath by Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr, a relative who staged a coup in 1968. A year later, Bakr named Hussein vice-chair of the Revolutionary Command Council, the regime's primary decision-making body. Within several years, as scholars agree, Hussein emerged as the real force behind the Ba'athist government, which helped modernize Iraq.

A social welfare system was created, a campaign against illiteracy was launched, the legal status of women was upgraded, the oil industry was nationalized and land reforms were undertaken.

In short, the Ba'ath improved the lives of many Iraqis and imposed a sense of nationhood on Iraq, riven by religious and ethnic differences.

But there was a price to pay. Iraq slid deeper into dictatorship, particularly after Bakr's resignation in 1979, and minorities — from Kurds to Jews — were further repressed.

All the while, Iraq — which has participated in several wars against Israel and which lobbed 39 Scud missles at Israeli cities during the Gulf War — lavished billions of dollars on building a large army and airforce.

The purpose was clear. First, Iraq sought to assume the leadership of the Arab world after Egypt's peace treaty with Israel. Second, Iraq hoped to fill the vacuum in the Persian Gulf following the Islamic revolution in Iran.

With the acquiescence of the West, Iraq came close to fulfilling these objectives. By failing, Iraq squandered vast resources, isolated itself and impoverished its population.

Today, bound by a regimen of sanctions which will not be lifted until it complies with all UN resolutions, Iraq is a nation under siege. But Saddam Hussein, the author of Iraq's greatest triumphs and misfortunes, is alive and well, thumbing his nose at the West.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 8

• Prime Minister Shimon Peres accepted the resignation of the head of the General Security Services. (Later in the week, in developments unprecedented in Israel, his identity – Carmi Gillon – was publicized, as was that of his replacement, Maj.-Gen. Ami Ayalon.)

• Yediot Acharonot reported that, in a meeting with hundreds of residents from Efrat, minister without portfolio Yossi Beilin stated that the government will try to keep most of the settlers under Israeli sovereignty.

Jan. 9

• Ha'aretz reported the government and the Palestinian Authority agreed that the IDF will temporarily leave the Palestinian areas of Hebron and concentrate itself within the city's Jewish neighborhoods on the day of the Palestinian elections. Palestinian policemen in civilian clothes and the international observers will remain in the Arab neighborhoods.

Jan. 10

• King Hussein arrived in Israel on his first ever official visit. He attended a ceremony at Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital to rename its trauma centre in memory of the late prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin. Ma'ariv reported that the Jordanian delegation included Qatar's Ambassador to the United States.

Jan. 11

• President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Shimon Peres represented Israel in Paris at the memorial service for Francois Mitterrand. Peres was one of the few non-family members at the private funeral.

Jan. 12

• A Gallup poll published in Ma'ariv stated that 37.2 per cent of the public supports a call for an early election; 22.1 per cent is opposed; 23.9 per cent is indifferent; and 16.8 per cent couldn't make up their minds.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• A special exhibition entitled Jerusalem, A Capital For All Times, opened at the Bible Lands Museum in collaboration with Bezalel Acadamy of Art and the Hebrew University. King David's capital in Jerusalem is compared to seven other capital cities of the ancient world. The exhibition is scheduled to remain open until the end of the year.

Israel, U.S.A. & the World

Israeli security chief a hero

After a particularly damaging raid which cost Israel seven dead and a number of prisoners, then defence minister Moshe Dayan ordered an appropriate response. The target chosen was Green Island, a fortress built by the British on a coral outcropping a mile off the Egyptian coast near the southern approaches to the canal.

A compact 100-metre-long fortress bristling with guns and protected by heavy artillery on the Egyptian mainland nearby, it was as difficult a target as could be chosen. Anti-aircraft guns would make any helicopter assault suicidal, while boats attempting to reach the island with assault troops would likely be blown out of the water before they reached it. It was decided to use naval commandos who would swim underwater to the island and attack at night.

Ayalon was one of the young officers on the assault team's second squad. The first squad's task was to emerge silently from the sea and overcome the Egyptian sentry posts on the water's edge. The second squad would then scale the roof of the fortress where the anti-aircraft guns and other heavy armament were emplaced. That is where the main battle would be fought.

Other commando squads would follow. With the fortress' heavy guns neutralized, boats would bring ashore fighters from an elite reconnaissance unit to finish the job.

The attackers achieved surprise and quickly established a beachhead. The second squad raced forward with Ayalon in the lead. In the brief time it had had to prepare the operation, the attack force experimented in swimming underwater with a collapsible ladder to be used in negotiating the 2.5 metres to the roof, but it had proven awkward swimming with it over a long distance. Instead, a tall squad member named Jacob was designated to serve as a ladder. Ayalon was to be the first to mount. Climbing onto Jacob's shoulders, he cautiously lifted his head over the edge of the roof.

There were two light anti-aircraft gun positions nearby, one to the right and one to the left. The positions were surrounded by concrete walls behind which sentries could be made out. A heavy machine gun covered both. Once he climbed onto the roof, Ayalon would be totally exposed. He pulled a smoke grenade from a pouch and hurled it toward the machine gun, but the grenade failed to explode. When Ayalon raised his head to see what had happened, his face was cut by ricocheting shrapnel.

Recovering quickly, he threw another grenade, but this too failed to explode. The water pressure at the depths to which the heavily loaded men had descended during their underwater approach to the island had rendered many of the grenades inoperable. If Ayalon was to make his move it would have to be without cover.

Taking a deep breath and counting to three, he vaulted onto the roof and headed for his target, the gun to the left. His partner, a young commando named Zali, was right behind him, scrambling over Jacob's back onto the roof. The pair threw grenades into the gun position. This time the grenades exploded. The commandos entered firing their Uzis, killing the two Egyptians inside. Another team mounted the roof behind them and took the right-hand gun position.

The boats carrying the second wave were delayed and the small number of commandos who had reached the roof came under mounting pressure. A burst from the machine gun severed two fingers on the hand of Zali, a talented flutist.

According to the detailed plan drawn up before the attack, the pair were to remain in the gun position until the second wave had passed them. However, the delay in the reinforcement's arrival and the murderous fire being delivered by the Egyptians prompted Ayalon to continue forward. "Can you shoot?" he asked his wounded partner. The answer was affirmative.

The two men bounded forward to an empty position closer to the machine gun. From there they threw grenades that finally silenced the gun, but not before Ayalon was wounded a second time when grenade fragments cut into his leg.

By the time the second wave reached the roof, half the men in the first wave had been killed or wounded.

Leaning on a comrade, he managed to make his way back to a rescue boat. He would receive the Medal of Valor for his performance on Green Island.

Agreement on free trade

It allows both Canada and Israel to export products containing American components, she noted. "It also paves the way for an eventual trilateral agreement with the U.S.," she added.

"With a population of approximately 5.5 million, Israel does not offer a very large market for Canadian products," noted Yehuda Raveh, president of the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce and Industry. "However, Canada can benefit greatly by using Israel as a bridge to reach Europe (with which Israel has a free trade agreement)," he said.

The American computer giant Intel uses Israel to export to Europe, he said. "There is no reason why Canadian companies can't do the same."

MASHGICHIM REQUIRED

The Kashruth Council of Toronto requires Sabbath observant individuals to serve as mashgichim for the summer of 1996 at facilities operated by the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto: Camp Northland-B'nai Brith in Haliburton, and Good Fellowship Lodge near Parry Sound. The positions require the individuals to live at these facilities; room and board are provided, along with transportation if required. Although only one mashgiach is required at each site at a particular time, the summer can be divided into successive duty periods covered by different mashgichim.

Additional work is available for periods throughout the year at Maple Lake Resort near Parry Sound, mostly for weekend groups, with some advance preparation time required. Individuals are welcome to apply for either or both of summer and year-round duties.

Candidates should be familiar with the requirements of hashgacha in a kitchen which serves both dairy and meat meals.

Following interviews with the Jewish Camp Council, suitable candidates will also be interviewed by the Kashruth Council.

Please send resumé with covering letter stating position(s) preferred to: The Jewish Camp Council of Toronto, 3995 Bathurst St., Suite 200, Downsview, Ont. M3H 5V3. Attention: Ellen Nash, Executive Director.

Jordanian theatre company brings 'gentle' satire to Israel

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — King Hussein made history with his visit to Tel Aviv last week. But his look-alike beat him to it by over a month.

Feature

Hisham Yanis, an accomplished impersonator of "His Majesty" and Nabil Sawalha, a fellow actor from Jordan, made history of their own in November, becoming the first Arab theatre company to ever perform in Israel.

The two actors — the stars and scriptwriter of Jordan's Ahlan Theatre Company — have presented their satirical look at the Middle East to audiences all over the world. But until now, they performed in Arabic mostly to Arab theatre-goers (including stints in Montreal and Ottawa in 1993).

November marked the first time that Nabil and Hisham — as they are known throughout Jordan — brought their irreverent impersonations of Arab and Israeli leaders to Israel, in an English-language presentation of Peace, Oh Peace.

"Why is is that everyone who wants to establish a new world order has to practise in the Middle East?" quipped Nabil at the opening of an evening that was not just a show, but an encounter between former enemies.

"I've never felt so apprehensive before a performance," he told The CJN. "I didn't sleep all night thinking about it."

And for good reason. Some people would say that the Jordanian actors must have a lot of chutzpah to present an unflattering portrait of Israelis at a theatre in Tel Aviv.

Take the way they depicted Israeli opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu. His solution to the Palestinian problem? "It's like photography. Shoot first and then see what develops."

Or Israeli negotiator Elyakim Rubinstein, whose idea of an important environmental issue is the impact of Jordanian pigeon droppings on Israeli tourism.

"The play is definitely done from an Arab point of view," says Nabil. "I'm bringing Israelis another perspective, but without bitterness. I'm laughing at Israelis and at ourselves."

Indeed it's not only Israelis who are the butt of jokes in this show. Yasser Arafat, who cannot pronounce the word "peace," repeatedly calls for a new era of "piss." When a Lebanese leader says, "In my personal opinion," he is abruptly cut off by his overbearing Syrian colleague who reminds him that "you have no personal opinion."

There are scenes where Muslim, Christian and Jewish fanatics bicker over who is better in God's eyes, while Israelis and Palestinians debate who has suffered more.

Pervading it all is a sense of the futility of war.

"Why did President Bill Clinton have tears in his eyes when he signed the Jordanian-Israeli peace treaty in the Arava desert? Was it emotion or just sand in his eyes?" asks a journalist in one scene.

"Neither," explains Jordan's King Hussein, played by Nabil. "He had a look at the Arava, saw no trees, no water, no greenery, nothing at all and cried: 'What have these lunatics been fighting for?' "

The audience loved it. "It wasn't always comfortable to hear jokes about yourself," said one Israeli spectator. "But it was like watching someone make fun of all the kids in the neighborhood. It was nice to finally feel included in the neighborhood."

The company has now performed the same show in front of Israeli, Palestinian, Jordanian and Western audiences.

"People seem to laugh at the same spots no matter what their nationality is," Nabil notes. "But we do make small changes depending on the audience. In Israel, Scud missiles jokes do not go over well. The subject cuts too close to the bone. Among Palestinians we tone down the jokes about Arafat."

Even "gentle" political satire is not tolerated in anything but a democracy, says Hisham. Jordan and the Palestinian Autonomy areas are the only Arab entities where the troupe has performed.

"We could go to many other Arab countries," says Hisham. "The problem is that we would never come back!"

Performing in Israel was a deeply disconcerting experience for the two Jordanian actors. For Hisham, it marked the return to the land he left in 1948.

"I was one year old when the war [with Israel] began and my family lost their home and fled to Jordan," he recalls.

During this visit, Hisham returned to the place where he was born — now a police station in the Israeli town of Beit Dagan. "I had hoped to find my birth certificate. I still don't know when I was born, except that it was during the eggplant harvest of 1947. But I couldn't recognize anything."

For Hisham, who has built a successful career in Jordan, it was a moment of reconciliation with the past. "I had grown up with this rainbow-like picture of the home we left behind. This visit shattered that myth.

Now, says Hisham, he no longer fantasizes about a home that does not exist. "I feel completely at peace with my identity as a Jordanian citizen of Palestinian origin."

Nabil, who was born in Jordan, also describes the visit to Israel as disconcerting. "You are a product of your own society, and for me that means that Israel is the one that invaded our land and displaced our people," he says.

So why visit at all?

"We have to deal with another reality — the existence of Israel and the fact that we have made peace," he explains. "We feel that talking with Israelis is better than turning our backs. Through understanding, we can forge a durable peace. But not all Jordanians can deal with this new reality. It's too much for some of them."

In fact, Nabil and Hisham's visit to Israel proved too much for many Jordanians. The country's writers union expelled them and hundreds of angry Jordanians called the theatre company vowing to boycott their performances.

The response of the Israeli audience only reinforced the conviction that they had done the right thing. The thunderous standing ovation left Hisham speechless and nearly in tears.

"I was so moved I couldn't say a word," he recalls.

At the second curtain call, Hisham recountedd, Nabil blurted out to the audience: "You're making history!"

"I suddenly realized what an incredible moment this was."

It was a moment in which Israelis found they could laugh at themselves — even when it's a former enemy who is telling the jokes.

And, to many, that's peace!

Israel Bonds lowers rates

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The interest rates on Israel Bonds will be lowered in an effort to be more competitive with money the Israeli government can raise in commercial markets.

The international organization announced what it called substantial decreases mainly in the bonds being sold with floating interest rates.

"We've reduced interest rates by having a larger spread below the prime rate than before" as a reflection of "our sensitivity to Israel's cost of raising money," said retired Gen. Nathan Sharony, president of Israel Bonds in New York.

Given its improved economic standing, "Israel has succeeded in raising money at a cheaper rate in the commercial market, so we had to adjust," Sharony said. "The government shouldn't pay a prohibitive price."

Israel Bonds offers to Diaspora Jews securities issued by the government of Israel and provides investment capital for the development of Israel's economy.

The reductions follow complaints by some Israeli politicians in recent years that the rates of the bonds made them burdensome to the government. The complaints angered many in the Diaspora establishment.

For Sharony, such remarks reflected a failure to understand that the bonds area an important connection to Israel for Diaspora Jews as well as " a safety net for a rainy day."

"No one wants to lose that," he said. "Irrespective of what Israel's economic or political situation is, this constituency always buys bonds, and in worse times, they buy more," he said.

Finance Minister Avraham Shochat praised the announcement, according to a statement issued by Israel Bonds.

"Israel should not give up an important source of income, one that is not dependent on economic and political fluctuations in the Middle East and the international capital market," he said.

Some of the changes include a drop in the floating rate bond with a fixed maturity date of Jan. 31, 2003, from the American prime rate minus 0.75 per cent to the prime rate minus 1.5 per cent. The interest rate will not exceed eight per cent.

The interest rate on the economic development bond will go down from 0.75 per cent to 0.70 per cent.

Documentary examines Israel's polarized society

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news Editor

TORONTO – Is Baruch Goldstein a mass murderer or a martyr? Did Yigal Amir act alone or was he influenced by the Kach movement and other right-wing organizations?

These are some of the questions director Yeud Levanon tries to get answers to in his documentary 119 Bullets + 3, airing on CBC Newsworld Jan. 21 at 8 p.m.

Levanon, a die-hard Tel Avivian, travels to the territories in the West Bank and gains the confidence of the religious settlers living there. Over 1 1/2 years he interviews leaders of the extremist organizations after first the Hebron massacre (119 bullets) and later Yitzhak Rabin's assassination (three bullets).

Flipping back and forth between Tel Aviv and Hebron, the documentary shows how polarized Israeli society has become. The hawks and doves are as different as day and night – as Tel Aviv and Hebron.

Among the extremists interviewed in Hebron are Yehuda Etzion, who recently completed a jail term for planning to plant a bomb at the Dome of the Rock Mosque, and Baruch Marzel, Rabbi Meir Kahane's successor.

Levanon's bias in his documentary is evident and at the end he returns to Tel Aviv, to what he calls "the real Israel." Still, 119 Bullets... is an informative look at the different sides threatening to launch Israel into a civil war.

A campy relic of a bygone era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

World War II produced a plethora of Hollywood war movies. Rather than being subtle, they were invariably bombastic, even propagandistic, the cinematic equivalent of popcorn: edible but unfilling.

The North Star, to be screened by Vision TV on Jan. 18 at 8 p.m., is a prime example of the genre.

Released in 1943, at the height of the conflict, it was directed by Lewis Milestone, written by Lillian Hellman and scored by Aaron Copland. Featuring an all-star cast (Anne Baxter, Dana Andrews and Walter Huston), The North Star is the story of a village in the Soviet Union, circa June 1941, which defends itself against a Nazi incursion.

The Russian burg, replete with singing and dancing peasants in ethnic garb, is positively bucolic.

The mood darkens when German planes strafe the village. But as black smoke rises, the villagers sing the Internationale in inspirational style. The pro-Soviet feel of the film, which was in keeping with the temper of the times, would prove to be an embarrassment just several years later, during the hysteria of the Cold War.

The Nazis are not portrayed in strictly monochromatic fashion. Yes, they are the bogeymen, the cruel conquerors who literally bleed the hapless children of the village to replenish their army's blood supply. However, one of the Nazi doctors (Erich Von Stroheim, the Jewish refugee from Nazi Germany) seems to possess redeeming qualities.

Characterized by over-the-top acting and vivid cinematography, The North Star is a somewhat campy relic of a bygone era, permeated with the uplifting but naive message that mankind should put an end to war.

A woman's decision to adopt her new husband's nephew in pre-WWII Czechoslovakia coincides with the rise of Nazism in Europe and threatens the family's well-being and safety. Directed by Jiri Weiss, Martha and I received best actor and best actress awards at the 1990 Venice Film Festival.

Society members are advised to show up by 7 p.m. as tickets ($7.50 for non-members) go on sale to non-members at 7.15. In German with English subtitles; restricted. 416-924-6211.

"Is Big-Ticket Theatre Really Dead?": A pitched rhetorical battle has been waged in the Globe and Mail recently between drama critic Kate Taylor and theatre entrepreneur Garth Drabinsky over the issue of whether Sunset Boulevard and the big-ticket theatrical business in general is losing steam in Toronto.

Eye On Arts couldn't hazard a guess without poring over box-office ledgers. But we note that Drabinsky's previous production of Show Boat certainly isn't losing any steam. Drabinsky's Livent, which took its acclaimed production of Show Boat to Broadway 15 months ago, grossed more than $1.15 million (US) in sales there during the last week of 1995, a record for highest single-week box office gross in Broadway history.

As well, a Livent production of Show Boat opened last month at the new $25- million Ford Centre For the Performing Arts in Vancouver. It also recently set a local box-office record, grossing $1.18 million in a single week.

A third Livent production of Show Boat is scheduled to open March 14 in Chicago.

Spotlight on El Al: Watch for the upcoming episode of the Canadian television series Yellow Brick Roads, which takes an in-depth look at El Al Israel Airlines. A 30-minute segment of the show traces the birth of the airline and the many challenges it has faced in its nearly five decades of operation.

As well, the show highlights Operation Magic Carpet and Operation Solomon, the historic airlifts of refugees to Israel, and offers a peek inside El Al's massive kosher kitchen in Tel Aviv, the world's largest. Shot entirely in Israel, the program also features historic footage of early Israel and some pioneering flights made by El Al in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

To be aired nationally on CBC Newsworld in the spring.

Guide a must for snowbirds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Our frigid winter climate drives increasing numbers of Canadians down south. And as baby boomers head toward their retirement years, there will be still more snowbirds flocking to the warm climes of Florida, Arizona and California.

To enjoy your vacation in the United States with complete peace of mind, you should obviously be well informed with regard to money management, tax laws, exchange rates, medical insurance and real estate.

The Canadian Snowbird Guide (McGraw-Hill Ryerson, $19.99), written by Douglas Grey, can help you master these issues.

Grey, a fount of knowledge, covers all the bases.

He paints a picture of the snowbird lifestyle. He explores the sometimes arcane world of financial planning. He deals with immigration, customs, housing and insurance. He explains tax codes, wills, trusts and estate planning. He advises you how to choose lawyers, accountants and financial planners.

Last but not least, Grey tells you how to find further information about the topics that interest you.

By any yardstick, The Canadian Snowbird Guide falls under the category of required reading. If you're into sun, sand and surf, take the time to read this useful book. Grey really knows his stuff.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

The Snowbound Traveller: Travel Talk recently utilized Air Canada's great weekend getaway fare: Toronto to New York, return, for $110 plus $50 in taxes. While in New York, a big snowstorm descended over much of the eastern U.S. seaboard, and almost all commercial flights were cancelled. Because of the storm, our four-day trip was extended against our control for another day.

Passengers who are bumped off their flights due to airline overbooking are routinely given hotel accommodations, and often complimentary meals, taxi vouchers and discount coupons for future travel. But when flights are cancelled due to inclement weather, no amenities are offered.

Like many stranded travellers, Travel Talk was subjected to hearing Let It Snow, Let It Snow, Let It Snow and other seasonal melodies for nearly half an hour while waiting to speak by phone to an Air Canada representative to reschedule our departure.

Despite the duress that they certainly must have felt, all airline staff we encountered were unfailingly courteous. The next day, La Guardia Airport was a zoo as flights continued to be delayed and cancelled. Despite being nearly swarmed by disgruntled passengers, Air Canada staff exuded a most impressive display of composure and efficiency. By evening, many flights were resuming, and Air Canada brought in a couple of large airbuses to get stranded passengers to their respective destinations.

It so happened Travel Talk had good reason to stay in Manhattan that extra night: to attend the Society of American Travel Writers' (SATW) annual party. It took place in the well-appointed drawing room of the 100-year-old former Villard Mansion at Madison Avenue and 51st Street, which now serves as the main public spaces of the deluxe New York Palace Hotel.

As partygoers mingled at the SATW gathering, Travel Talk noticed a woman sitting alone beside a frosted, leaded-glass window, gazing out wistfully at the seasonal colored lights and the spires of nearby St. Patrick's Cathedral. Outside, snow was swirling as in a handheld paperweight. With snow blanketing the streets, Manhattan seemed a picturesque wonderland. One could almost picture graceful horses and buggies instead of the messy gridlock of buses, taxis and limos.

The tableau seemed almost like a scene from It's A Wonderful Life or Miracle on 34th Street. And the sitter? None other than Tania Grossinger, whose parents established and operated the legendary Jewish resort Grossinger's in the Catskills for many years.

In Northern Ireland, the company offers an Antrim to Donegal route and an Ulster Ramble, and has also designed an itinerary along Scotland's Western Coast. In its latest brochure, Freewheeling Adventures is offering Israel: A Personal Aliyah for some time in the fall of 1996 or the spring of 1997.

"You will journey in desert and oasis, in valleys and over mountains, along the shores of three seas, in the present and in the past. You will use your bicycles, your feet, and most of all your senses, to really appreciate Israel," the brochure says.

Former hoopster inducted into Mac U hall of fame

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back in the days when Bert Raphael wore a younger man's clothes, he was better known for setting records than for examining his clients' insurance records.

On the basketball court, Raphael centred the McMaster Marauders' hoops squad and was named to the CIAU all-star team. Over his three-year career, he became the first player to score more than 300 points in a season for McMaster.

Prior to that, he held the school records of 14 free throws in a game and 37 points a single game. Playing for Central Collegiate in Hamilton, he set a record of 64 points in a single game and he played on four consecutive city championships.

Bert Raphael is all smiles as he views the display of his playing days at McMaster University.

Raphael, who long ago hung up his Air Jordans in exchange for barrister's robes, was recently recognized for his hardwood performances, by being inducted into McMaster University's Basketball Hall of Fame.

The presentation read: "Bert's reputation as a player with a soft scoring touch was well-deserved. For three years, he filled the net with a deadly shooting arsenal, hitting several team milestones.

"Some of his records lasted more than a decade ... In his final season, Bert's leadership earned him the team captaincy."

Looking back on his salad days in the late 1950s, Raphael said that at six foot four, he was considered a big man to play centre. "Now, I'd be lucky to be a guard."

In later years, he admired the elegance and ability of Dr. J (Julius Irving), though in his day, he said, "I couldn't dribble. But I had a great jump shot."

The late writer Gary Lautens once called his jumper "a cobra's kiss," he recalled.

Though he was offered a medical scholarship at Western if he continued to play basketball, part of the deal included strapping on the pads and playing for the football team. After getting bounced around at a pre-season trial, he decided to hang up the cleats and he chose to pursue another career.

For the next four years, he played for the Osgoode Hall Owls while studying law. Since then, he's become a successful lawyer specializing in insurance matters; he's been named Queen's Counsel; and he's been awarded the Law Society's medal for distinguished service to the profession.

He's also known for championing human rights and for advocating legal sanctions against Nazi war criminals.

Raphael said he got tremendous satisfaction from being named to the McMaster Hall of Fame, considering that at the time he played, McMaster was a Baptist school and, as far as he knows, he's the only Jew in the Hall.

His one regret was that he never got to play for Canada in the Maccabiah Games.

Raphael maintains his ties to the sport. He's an avid Raptors fan and a season ticket holder.

His three brothers also took to the hardwood. Brother Bob played for McMaster, his brother Jerry suited up for Waterloo Lutheran and brother Stan ended up playing for Yeshiva U.

Surprisingly, their father knew very little about basketball. When Bert once asked him to come watch him play a game in February, his father wanted to know whether they'd be playing indoors or outside, Raphael recalled.

American footballers go 'bowling'

Place-kicking brothers pummel the pigskin

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Jewish players in pads played key roles for their teams as America enjoyed its annual winter football binge — the bowl season.

Five college athletes, two of them place-kicking brothers, took to the field for U.S. colleges in bowl games from coast to coast.

Sophomore Adam Abrams of the University of Southern California (USC) and senior Eric Abrams of Stanford University are their teams' place-kickers. Southern Cal beat Northwestern 41-32 in the Rose Bowl in Pasadena, Calif., while Stanford lost to East Carolina 19-13 in the Liberty Bowl in Memphis.

A third Jewish kicker to pummel the pigskin is Kevin Kopka, who laces up his cleats for Notre Dame (ND). The Fighting Irish lost 31-25 to Florida State in the Orange Bowl.

Freshman Mike Rosenthal, a six-foot-seven, 290-lb. offensive lineman, also played for Notre Dame.

The fifth Jewish player who went bowling is Scott Slutzker, starting tight end for the University of Iowa, which humbled the University of Washington 38-18 in the Sun Bowl in El Paso, Tex.

Eric and Adam Abrams are the sons of the former Lauren Kramer of Buffalo and her husband, Dr. Jeffrey Abrams, a graduate of the University of Buffalo medical school.

Eric, the senior of the two, was chosen to the second All-America team by United Press International and was also named first team Academic All-Pacific 10 Conference. He was slated to handle the kicking duties in the Senior Bowl, the annual showcase of draft-eligible players for professional scouts and football fanatics.

During his four-year career, in which he led Stanford in scoring each season, Eric made 52 of 74 field goals and 126 of 131 points after touchdown (PATs).

His total of 282 points makes him Stanford's highest scoring player ever and number nine in Pac-10 history (seventh among kickers). This year, he made 16 of 28 field goals and was two for two in the 40-49 yard range. He was one for two from outside 50 yards.

A finalist for the Lou Groza Award, presented to the nation's top place-kicker, Eric also excels academically, registering a 4.0 scholastic average.

His brother Adam, a sophomore scholastically but a freshman in athletic eligibility, didn't have quite the season enjoyed by his older brother. He was hurt for much of the year and played in only five of 11 games. He made three of four field goals, the longest from 41 yards, and was good on 16 of 17 PATs.

Kopka, a strong-legged freshman from Hollywood, Fla., handled the kickoffs for Notre Dame.

He started the season handling the Irish's field goals and PATs but he struggled and had to give way to a more experienced kicker.

Altogether, he made 27 of 29 PATs and was good on six of 11 three-pointers, the longest from 45 yards. He's expected to be the starting field goal kicker for the Irish next year.

Rosenthal, his teammate, is already being touted as a future All-American and probably has the most professional potential of the five.

At Penn High School in Granger, Ind., a suburb of South Bend, where Notre Dame is located, Rosenthal had an outstanding career.

He was named to the high school All-America first team by USA Today, Parade, SuperPrep, Prep Football Report and Blue Chip Illustrated, was named top offensive lineman nationally by SuperPrep and second by Bluechip Illustrated.

The Detroit Free Press named him to its "Best of the Midwest" team, the only unanimous selection in the team's seven-year history.

His high school team was 30-3 during his three-year stint there.

As a college freshman, he started three games because of injuries to starters Chris Clevenger and Mike Doughty, and he logged 100 minutes of playing time, top among backup linemen.

"He's going to be great, an All-American before he's finished," said John Heisler, ND's sports information director. "Next year he'll definitely be one of the five best offensive lineman we have."

Rosenthal started for the Irish in wins over Air Force and USC and in the loss to then top-ranked Ohio State.

Slutzker, a two-year starter at Iowa, stands six foot five and weighs in at 249 lbs. He has an excellent chance of being drafted in 1996.

A native of Hasbrouch Heights, N.J., he was named a pre-season third team All American by one football magazine.

Last year he was the Hawkeyes' second best receiver with 27 catches for 379 yards, a 14.1 yard-per-catch average, to go with two touchdowns.

As a high school senior, he caught 38 passes for 737 yards, place-kicked and returned punts.

Last year, against Rose Bowl foes Penn State and Oregon, he had 13 catches for 270 yards and one touchdown. He was named ABC-TV's player of the game against Michigan.

Notre Dame just keeps on recruiting Jewish athletes. In addition to their gridiron stars, ND has point guard Doug Gottlieb playing for its basketball team, while last year, Gus Ornstein was the football team's backup quarterback before transferring to Michigan State.

330 OBITUARIES

Dear Jesse,

I am an 85-year-old woman who appears and acts much younger than her age. My husband, with whom I spent all of my waking hours, passed away last year and my only child died almost 10 years ago. I have grandchildren and great-grandchildren, however, they are spread over North America, and unfortunately, I rarely see them. Most of my friends are either in nursing homes or no longer alive.

I miss my husband terribly and since his death I have been somewhat of a recluse and depressed. As a couple we were always on the move, but were also content to be just the two of us. What should I do?

S. B.

Dear S. B.,

It sounds as though you and your late husband shared a special relationship. As you say living alone is painful. In fact, coping with bereavement is a difficult task and few people can do so alone. Seeking help is a sign of strength and can ultimately provide a means of coping with your loss.

There are resources available in your community. Firstly, I suggest contacting your local Jewish Family Services, synagogue or municipal community centre. They may refer you to a bereavement support group for seniors like yourself. Attending such a group can provide you with an opportunity to share your feelings with others experiencing a similar loss. Here you can attain the support and understanding you need, as well as learn how to cope during this difficult time.

You describe yourself as an active lady who is young at heart. Keep in mind your local community centre, YMHA and synagogue often offer seniors a wide variety of activities specifically geared to individual needs and interests. These can take the form of lectures, discussion groups, outings and various other recreational activities.

Finally, with your vitality and energy you might want to consider exploring volunteer work. You have a lot to offer in this regard and there exists a constant need for volunteers in the community.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Election results as expected

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In the presidential election, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat garnered 88.1 percent of the vote, Mahmoud Abbas, the head of the Palestinian Central Elections Commission, said Sunday night.

Arafat's lone challenger, Samiha Khalil, won 9.3 percent of the vote, and 2.6 percent of the votes were disqualified.

People fired guns in the air and honked car horns on the streets to celebrate the victory.

By Sunday night, winners of most of the Palestinian Council's 88 seats in the council were known. Complete returns may not be ready until mid-week.

See related stories pgs. 25, 26 and editorial pg. 8

The final makeup of the council appears to be about 55 percent Fatah, 20 percent Fatah-linked independents, 15 percent other independents, six percent Islamic and four percent left-wing parties.

Carl Lidbom, head of a 650-person observer team that included representatives from the European Union, China, Russia and Canada, said early estimates showed that some 75 percent of eligible voters participated in the election.

Winners postponed celebrations until after the iftar, the festive meal that breaks the fast every evening during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which began Sunday.

Arafat joked Sunday about his landslide victory, suggesting a lower rate of approval would probably have looked more democratic.

"I was looking for 51 percent,"Arafat said after a meeting with former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who led a 40-member election observer team.

The new Palestinian legislators include Hanan Ashrawi, a former Arafat spokesperson; chief Palestinian peace negotiator Ahmed Qreia; Saeb Erakat, who organized the elections; and Imad Falouji, who broke away from Hamas to run as an independent.

Observers of the elections called the polling a success, despite several irregularities. Carter said there were some problems in the voting, but not on a scale that would have altered the outcome.

CJC MEETS PERES

Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres (right) met last week with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) President Goldie Hershon and CJC Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen. The CJC delegation, in Israel for the 10th Global Assembly of the World Jewish Congress, also met with opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu and visited the grave of Yitzhak Rabin. Peres will be in Canada to attend the Canada-Israel Committee's annual conference on March 19.

Pizza to go!

CALGARY — Rabbi Allen Saks wasn't kidding when he longed for a kosher slice of New York.

Depressed from Calgary's frigid weather and missing the Jewishness of his native Manhattan, Rabbi Saks got a boost when he discovered a magazine ad in which his favorite old haunt, Broadway's Jerusalem 2 eatery, claimed to deliver kosher pizza anywhere in the United States within 24 hours.

He dialed the 1-800 number and asked for a 4,000-kilometre order. First, though, he had to explain where Calgary is.

The next day, Rabbi Saks, principal at the Akiva Academy, sank his teeth into the gooey, cheesy heaven.

He ordered 10 pizzas, which the restaurant cut into slices and packaged specially. Federal Express made the delivery.

The order cost $300 – over half for shipping and handling – but the rabbi insists it was worth it.

Intended 'not to kill'

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – In a new twist in the investigation into Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, the student who confessed to the murder told investigators last week that he had only intended to cripple Rabin in an effort to remove him from the political arena.

Yigal Amir made the statement during a recent interview conducted in his jail cell by two investigators who were gathering information for the Shamgar Commission, the state panel of inquiry into the Nov. 4 assassination.

"I am incapable of killing innocent people. My intention was not to kill [Rabin]," Amir reportedly said.

"Paralyzing him also would have been good. That's why I did not shoot him in the head and aimed for the spine."

The 25-year-old law student also told the investigators that even on the night of the Nov. 4 peace rally in Tel Aviv, he had not known whether he would be able to carry out his plan to shoot Rabin.

Amir has not yet entered a plea to the charges against him.

He is also being tried with his brother Hagai and friend Dror Adani on charges of conspiring to assassinate Rabin, of planning attacks against Arabs and of illegal possession of weapons. They were formally charged with the offences in Tel Aviv last week.

The judges in the case postponed the date for that trial until April 17. The three defendants have until Feb. 26 to enter their pleas.

The judges also ordered that Hagai Amir and Adani be held in custody until the conclusion of the legal proceedings against them.

During the recent hearing, the attorney for Hagai Amir stated that a well-known political activist in the territories had acted as a go-between for Yigal Amir to obtain rabbinic approval for the assassination.

The lawyer refused to name the alleged go-between.

The Israeli media reported that the person was Benny Katzover, a leading activist in the Yesha Council, which represents Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Katzover denied the claim, saying that he had met Yigal Amir a few times during protests in the territories, but that he had never been any kind of mediator.

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has established the Alan Rose Fund for International Human Dignity, in memory of the organization's former executive vice-president, who died last year.

Donations to the fund will help support lectures, publications, relief shipments to needy communities and other creative options, according to CJC president Goldie Hershon.

ISRAEL

Orders for Rabin Medals

JERUSALEM – Orders for specially-struck medals honoring Yitzhak Rabin are being taken through the Canadian representative of the Israel Government Coins and Medals Corp.

There will be two gold issues, one in 24 karats, the other in .750 fine gold (18 kt). Mintage of the two will be limited to orders received prior to Jan. 31.

Orders for a proof .999 silver must be received before March 31.

Bronze and copper-nickel editions, and sets are also available.

For information call 514-484-5201.

Amir Petition Rejected

JERUSALEM — Tel Aviv District Court has rejected a petition by Yigal Amir to postpone his plea hearing for three months or until the Shamgar Commission releases its findings.

Amir, through his lawyer Jonathan Goldberg, argued that conclusions reached by the commission may influence the case.

Bill Defeated

JERUSALEM — Tsomet's bill calling for the early dissolution of the Knesset and elections in July was rejected last week 52-31, with five abstentions.

Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal, who spoke on behalf of the government, proposed enacting a law which would require elections to take place no later than 45 days after an early dissolution of the Knesset.

1995 Casualties

JERUSALEM — Fifty-one soldiers fell in action during 1995, 23 of them in Lebanon, according to the annual report submitted by OC Manpower Branch Maj.-Gen. Gideon Sheffer to the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence committee.

The number of suicides, 43, was the same as in 1994. Twenty soldiers were killed in accidents of different types.

Compensation Sought

TEL AVIV — Norway's tiny Jewish population wants the Norwegian government to pay for Jewish property seized by the country's Nazi colaborationist regime, according to the chief rabbi.

Internet Censorship

JERUSALEM — Hoping to combat unlimited use of the Internet by hate groups, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre is asking Internet access providers to censor materials that "promote racism, anti-Semitism, mayhem and violence."

Internet providers have a moral obligation not to supply hate groups with a platform for "their destructive propaganda," the centre reported in Los Angeles.

77,000 Olim In 1995

JERUSALEM — Last year some 77,000 olim came to Israel, according to figures from Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal.

Of this total, 65,000 arrived from the former Soviet Union.

Transport Agreement

JERUSALEM — Jordan and Israel signed a long-awaited transport agreement last week at a ceremony at Beit Gavriel, on the shores of Lake Kinneret.

Under the agreement, it will be possible, within a month, to drive directly into Jordan via existing crossing points at an estimated cost of $35 to $50 a person.

Meeting Palestinians

JERUSALEM — Despite strong objections from Israeli officials, Dutch Foreign Minister Hans Van Mierlo met last week with Palestinian officials in eastern Jerusalem.

Mierlo's talks at Orient House, the Palestine Liberation Organization's de facto headquarters in eastern Jerusalem, disrupted what was otherwise described as an amicable and productive visit to Israel by a delegation led by Dutch Prime Minister Wim Kok.

Settlers Removed

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials last week forcibly removed Jewish settlers who were living illegally in apartments in a Kiryat Arba neighborhood.

Police broke down doors and windows to enter the buildings, which had been earmarked to house border police after the Israel Defence Force redeployment from parts of Hebron this spring.

WORLD

Pope's Message

ROME — Pope John Paul II rejoiced in the progress of Middle East peace, but warned that differences about the status of Jerusalem could put the peace process in jeopardy.

In his annual State of the World address, the pontiff also condemned anti-Semitism and deplored the longstanding tensions between Christians and Jews.

The pope also reiterated the Vatican position that Jerusalem should be a unique, multireligious entity.

Weizman Visits Germany

BERLIN — Israeli President Ezer Weizman, on a four-day visit last week to Germany, said it was difficult for him to be here, where he heard "voices crying to me from the earth" from the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

The trip is the Israeli president's first to the reunited Germany. The visit broke a deadlock over financing the $137.2 million in annual pensions for East European Jews.

Yozma

NEW YORK — The Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel will run its Yozma internship program for the second year.

For the fall of 1996, Yozma will expand to seven full-time, 10-month internship positions within the Jewish community for eligible alumni and finalists of the Bronfman Youth Fellowship program.

Temple volunteers, students help homeless

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most people reading this article today can count on having the following:

- A roof over their heads;
- A bed;
- A meal;
- A winter coat, boots and gloves.

For Toronto's homeless, such amenities are harder to come by. One response to what has become a growing problem is Out of the Cold, a volunteer-run, privately funded program held at some two dozen Metro churches on a rotating basis. At least two locations are open nightly from the beginning of November to the end of March.

This year for the first time, a synagogue has joined the program. Every Monday, a contingent from Holy Blossom Temple heads to St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, just east of Roy Thomson Hall, to offer hands-on assistance.

Of 150 temple volunteers, 30 to 40 show up each week. They are joined by a dozen students — from a pool of almost 50 — from the social action committee of the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union.

Working in shifts, together with the church volunteers, they cook, set tables, serve, clean up and socialize with up to 200 dinner guests, an assorted crew of the down-on-their-luck and the hopelessly destitute.

It's just after 6 p.m. The doors have opened and guests (the only term the volunteers use) are signed in one at a time. About half will spend the night.

They range in age from early 20s to 60ish. About 90 per cent are men. Some are obviously needy, with missing front teeth or shabby clothes reeking of alcohol. A few are indistinguishable from the volunteers. There are natives and people of color. Two guests in recent months have identified themselves as Jewish.

Many of the faces have become familiar to Rev. Michael Barnes in the four years St. Andrew's has been part of the program. A big, burly man with a full greying beard, he greets the guests warmly, but demands compliance with house rules.

"There's no smoking and no drinking. If they have a bottle, we'll take it from them and give it back in the morning," he states. Weapons are also prohibited, but he's never seen any, he adds.

On entering, guests can browse the racks of donated clothes — among them this evening two fur coats — or help themselves to hearty sandwiches to take the edge off their appetites. A more substantial hot meal will be served later.

The outlook is grim for Toronto's poor this year. There are an estimated 3,800 homeless people, and recent provincial welfare cuts have made even cheap housing increasingly unaffordable.

"It's a growing problem," says Rabbi Dow Marmur. "We as citizens have a responsibility [to respond]. Holy Blossom has a long tradition of social involvement. It's kind of natural for us."

"This is supposed to be our mentoring year," said psychologist Freda Muscovitch, a member of the temple's social action committee and the driving force behind its involvement in Out of the Cold. She now serves as Out of the Cold project leader and is working on a feasibility study examining ways in which Holy Blossom can run an independent Out of the Cold project next year.

Although congregation members responded enthusiastically to the call for volunteers, there was apprehension about working so closely with the homeless, said Muscovitch. Few if any street people are seen in the area of the synagogue, on Bathurst Street south of Eglinton Avenue.

After one session downtown, volunteers' preconceptions vanished, Muscovitch noted.

"Street people does not mean being a thief or alcoholic," says Carlos, a 35-year-old El Salvadoran who's been homeless for two years, working odd jobs when he can get them. "I prefer to eat here than to rob a store and go to jail."

For Terry, a personable 33-year-old, the future has become brighter. He just landed a job at an automotive plant. It's not his first time at St. Andrew's and he chats with two student volunteers like they are old friends.

"These girls are smiling, they're nice and they help everybody," he says. "All the [volunteers] make you feel pretty good. That's important."

It's apparent that street life eats at one's dignity. "You learn to defend yourself pretty good," said Terry, who found that his relationship with his girlfriend sparked resentment in some situations.

Ken's future — in his eyes — looks bleaker than Terry's. "I have no future," he said bluntly. Embittered by 15 months on the street, where he was the target of a racially motivated attack, he is well-spoken and obviously educated.

After leaving university — two semesters short of a degree — he landed a job from which he was eventually laid off, he said. Now off the street, but working sporadically like Carlos, his future remains uncertain.

"Out of the Cold accepts that some of these people will remain homeless," says Muscovitch. "It doesn't attempt to change society, but it does give respite."

Seeking to serve the community

Recently, I was asked to speak about the challenges faced by The CJN in providing news of Israel to the Jewish community. I used the opportunity to explain to the audience the parameters within which The CJN operates. To complement the column I wrote in this space two weeks ago on Key Issues Facing the Jewish Press, it may be worthwhile to repeat that explanation.

As all publications, The CJN functions within two distinct but different types of operational parameters. The first are the policy parameters established by the Board of Directors. The second are the de facto, pragmatic considerations arising from the day-to-day business of running a paper and establishing annual budgets.

The policy parameters are not theoretical guidelines. They are an actual statement of the Board of Directors committed to paper. The basic policy and purpose of The CJN is "to serve the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations." Everything about the paper starts from this point. We regard this mandate as a high responsibility.

Of course, how the newspaper truly serves the community is by attempting to inform it in the best, most reliable and most comprehensive manner that it can. The better the community is informed, the more likely it is to be healthy, strong, vibrant, and confident, or, as the directors have expressed, "spiritually alive, intellectually alert, socially responsible and economically secure, and thus a great asset to Canada and to Jewish communities throughout the world, including Israel."

In fulfilment of the paper's mandate to better inform the community, covering the news and providing instructive and interesting features for the readers, the editor has a wide discretion. Assuming the editor acts with integrity, awareness and sensitivity, that discretion is fettered, essentially, only by the second set of parameters, namely, the de facto ones.

What are these de facto parameters?

First and foremost is the fact that the paper is a weekly. I commented on this factor two weeks ago in this space. "The stories and columns are generally written at least one week before they are read. Therefore, to compete with television, radio and the dailies, we must cover the stories which are of special interest to our community, as well as provide a different, more focused angle to the stories that these media do cover."

The second factor is the paper's size. The Toronto edition of The CJN averages between 40 and 48 pages each week. The Montreal edition is slightly smaller. As a result, it is physically impossible to publish each week all the stories that "deserve" to be published. Indeed, many more stories are written than appear on the pages of the paper. But there is simply not room to print them all.

This is unfortunate for a number of important reasons, but two are especially compelling. We are unable to provide an even wider menu of news, stories and features to our readers. And we are unable to cover the many interesting events emanating from the hundreds of organizations in the community. Inevitably, we must disappoint many organizations whose news stories fail to appear in our pages.

We attempt to deal fairly and evenhandedly with all the organizations. It is therefore the policy of the paper that we will not provide news coverage both in advance of the event and of the event itself, unless it contains an overwhelming news value. This may occur, for example, as a result of the identity of a speaker or the subject matter of the event or the numbers involved in the event. When we do have space available in the paper, we try to provide coverage of an event either in advance or following the event, but not both.

The core activity of The CJN is providing the news credibly and comprehensively. This will never be compromised.

But there are readers whom we have not yet "reached" and to whom we believe we have something stimulating, entertaining, informative and occasionally, even inspiring to offer. Thus, The CJN is a work-in-progress, experimenting gradually with new ideas, new features and new columns for the readers.

The mandate of the paper, as ordained by its directors, is to inform the community as well as it possibly can, to help ensure that it is "spiritually alive, intellectually alert, socially responsible and economically secure."

This is not only their instruction to the editor; it is also the editor's commitment to The CJN's readers.

Worthwhile Reading

Slavery and Jews: exchange of correspondence, the Atlantic Monthly, January 1966

Four individuals correspond with Winthrop D. Jordan, the author, in the Sept.'95 issue of the Atlantic Monthly of a review of a book published by The Nation of Islam entitled The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews, purporting to prove Jewish involvement in and responsibility for the black slave trade.

In his article, Jordan generally dismisses the historicity of the work. The letter writers, however, take Jordan to task for even reviewing the work, thereby lending it the stature which might suggest that it warrants review in the first place.

Even without having read the initial Jordan article, the exchange is interesting and informative. "Some books are just not worth talking about, and some books are not worth the dignity of a scholarly review. Some books deserve only the dignity of the big round file. The Secret Relationship is one of them." MBD

Holocaust survivors respond to Spielberg's project

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of Holocaust survivors in Toronto responding to director Steven Spielberg's videotaping of wartime testimony is increasing.

As of last week, the number of interviews done here surpassed 1,000, "a definite improvement" over a few months ago, when the Los Angeles-based organizers of the global project said the response in this city was disappointing.

The taping of survivors' testimony has "gotten much stronger" in Toronto, said Ari Zev, director of research and training for Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

"We want to stay [in Toronto] as long as we can," he said.

There had been talk of shutting down the project here if things did not pick up.

The foundation was set up here and in other cities in late 1994 as part of the director's plan to commit to film the stories of as many Holocaust survivors as possible.

Toronto was among the first cities to have an office. The others were New York, Miami, Jerusalem and Los Angeles. Since then, taping has also taken place in Sydney, Paris, Warsaw, St. Petersburg and a dozen other cities.

The 1991 federal census showed there were just under 13,000 Holocaust survivors in the Greater Toronto Area.

That means just over seven percent of Toronto survivors have come forward to be taped for the Spielberg project. Los Angeles is the leader in the number of interviews done, at just over 2,000. New York is a close second and Toronto third overall.

About a dozen interviews have taken place in Montreal. There are some 800 survivors registered for taping, from cities across Canada.

The number of interviews done worldwide is approaching 10,000.

But Janet Klein, the foundation's Toronto regional coordinator, told The CJN, "We would like more [local interviews]. The window of opportunity is closing quickly."

The Toronto office conducts an average of 20 interviews a week, she noted.

The foundation eschews advertising and overt publicity. The project depends mainly on media exposure and word of mouth.

Klein noted that some survivors may not want to repeat their stories after they have already done so for the Toronto Holocaust Remembrance Committee's Oral History Project, which has recorded the experiences of some 400 Toronto survivors over the past 10 years.

But she's imploring more survivors to come forward, in order to make the global project as complete as possible.

The project employs trained volunteers as interviewers and state-of-the-art video and sound equipment.

Trained volunteers

Many will recall Spielberg's 1994 Oscar night pledge "not to allow the Holocaust to remain a footnote in history."

Spielberg himself is said to have contributed $3 million to the project. Additional funding has come from MCA-Universal, NBC, The Wasserman Foundation and Time-Warner.

The foundation estimates that the entire project will cost more than $60 million (US).

Volunteers, many of whom are survivors themselves, staff the toll-free telephone lines in the foundation's headquarters near Universal Studios in Los Angeles.

Once a survivor registers with the headquarters, the name is given to a local office, where the interview is arranged.

When an interview is completed, the tape is sent to Los Angeles, where several types of copies are made, including high-quality CD-ROM.

Cataloguers watch each interview, cross-referencing key words and subjects — such as specific camps, ghettos and towns.

Interviews with survivors are supplemented by documents, photo albums, maps and optional appearances by the survivor's family. None of the testimony is edited and every survivor receives a free VHS tape of his or her interview.

The video archives will be available at five different institutions: New York's Museum of Jewish Heritage; The Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles; the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington; the Fortunoff Archive for Holocaust Testimonies at Yale University; and Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

Spielberg's goal is to collect and process 50,000 testimonies by the end of 1997 and have an online, multimedia database of close to 150,000 interviews by 2004.

The number of survivors in the world is estimated at between 250,000 and 350,000. Zev believes it may be as high as 400,000.

Those working on the project say that in a few years, all the data will be available via home computers.

Plans also call for the production of documentaries, books and CD-ROM applications for schools, in which students will virtually "walk through" a concentration camp barrack, see different faces and click on a face to hear that person's story.

The visual history project includes all Jews who lived under Nazi rule in Europe between 1935 and 1945. Under this broad definition, Jews who left Germany as refugees before the outbreak of war are also classified as survivors.

In addition, Spielberg said he wanted to interview Righteous Gentiles who hid or rescued Jews, and Allied soldiers who took part in the liberation of the camps, in order to "see the Holocaust from every single perspective."

To register, call the toll-free number at 1-800-661-2092. The mailing address is P.O. Box 3168, Los Angeles, Calif, U.S.A., 90078-3168.

Collecting Yiddish books

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a lucky day for Robert Goldenberg, volunteer zamler (book collector) for the National Yiddish Book Centre in Amherst, Mass.

He picked up seven large cartons of Yiddish books that had lain unread in the attic of a Toronto home. In the boxes, he discovered the complete works of Sholem Aleichem (28 volumes), 10 volumes of Mendele Mocher Seforim, the works of Jules Verne in English and Karl Marx's Das Kapital in Yiddish.

Another time, Goldenberg, 60, a retired high school teacher, drove in from his Fort Erie home to collect 12 volumes of Yiddish plays, including several by S. Anski, author of The Dybbuk.

As the regional zamler, Goldenberg and his wife, Penina, don't mind driving to Toronto and any reasonable distance beyond, to collect books for the centre, which distributes them free to teachers and students in many countries, including England, Spain, Italy, Germany and Russia.

"I will pick up and deliver the books to the centre at no charge," Goldenberg said. "We visit the centre often and besides, we have a friend in Buffalo whose daughter works in Amherst."

In fact, the Goldenbergs belong to the Mamaloshen Maven Yiddish conversational group in Buffalo, and like to come to events sponsored by the Friends of Yiddish in Toronto.

His car has zamler on the licence plate, while his wife, a well known Yiddish singer, has klezmer on hers.

"The only people who have ever asked us what our license plates mean are customs officers at the border," Goldenberg said.

The Goldenbergs may be contacted at 15 Highland Ave., Fort Erie, Ont., L2A 2X6. Phone 905-871-1098.

Judges named to Ontario Court, Court of Appeal

Michael Moldaver, Marc Rosenberg join appellate division

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Practising law was something Michael Moldaver always wanted to do and something his parents always encouraged him to pursue.

His older brother Joel preceded him into the legal profession and Moldaver "always looked up to him as someone I admired and followed."

A longtime specialist in criminal law, Moldaver joins colleagues Marc Rosenberg of Toronto and Louise Charron of Ottawa as recently-appointed judges of the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Prior to the appointment, Moldaver served as a judge of the Ontario Supreme Court.

Before joining the bench in 1990, Moldaver practised criminal law in Toronto. From 1979-83 he was with the firm Greenspan, Gold, Moldaver.

Michael Moldaver

"I was absolutely thrilled, ecstatic and honored" to be named to the appeal court, Moldaver told The CJN. "For a kid from Peterborough, it's a dream come true.

"I had hoped for it. I love the law and I love working with the law. Hopefully, I will help in the development of the law in this province," he said.

Rosenberg, who has practised law since 1976, was working as counsel for the Ministry of the Attorney General, public law and policy section when he was named to the High Court.

He has lectured on evidence at Osgoode Hall Law School since 1986 and he has headed the section on criminal procedure for the Bar Admission Course since 1991.

From 1987 to 1990, Rosenberg served as director of the Criminal Lawyers Association and he has collaborated with Greenspan in editing Martin's Criminal Code since 1978.

The appointments of Moldaver and Rosenberg bring the number of appellate judges to 18. They were sworn in on Jan. 26.

Moldaver comes from a family steeped in the Jewish tradition. "Our family was Conservative and we went to shul Friday night and Saturday morning," he said.

Joan Lax

His father, Irving, was in the scrap metal business and his mother, Ruth, was active in home and school committees and the local synagogue, the Beth Israel.

Moldaver's brother, Joel, is past president of the shul, while a second brother, Pesach, is a teacher at the Beth Jacob seminary for girls.

His uncle, Isadore Black, is a community leader in Peterborough while another uncle, Aaron Black, and his cousin Howard Black, are active at the Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

"Obviously I have a great affinity to the Jewish community," Moldaver said.

About 25 years ago, Joan Lax was teaching school at Northview Collegiate and considering a career change.

Her husband, Clifford, was practicing law as were several of her male cousins and "it seemed this would be a challenging career to pursue."

Lax applied to law school in Toronto and was called to the bar in 1976. After practising for 10 years and serving as assistant dean of law at the University of Toronto for another 10, Lax was recently named a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division).

"I felt great excitement," she said on hearing of the appointment. "Also great fear. It's a tremendous responsibility. Being a judge is being a public servant. I feel I have a responsibility to the people of Ontario, to serve them well, to be fair and compassionate."

Lax specialized in civil litigation while a partner at the firm of Weir and Foulds. In 1986, she took the assistant dean position at the U of T, where she also lectured on courtroom techniques.

In 1991, she was elected a bencher of the Law Society and she has chaired its committee that oversees Legal Aid clinics.

Her husband, Clifford, serves as president of the Advocates Society, which made for a situation that must have been unique in the annals of law in Ontario.

Traditionally, the president of the society addresses new judges when they are sworn in and this time, the president's spouse was among those being addressed.

Asked whether any friendly rivalry related to their profession had ever developed between the spouses, Joan said, "We've been married 27 years. We've learned to share a lot of things, a home, a family, a profession and one another."

Members of a Toronto synagogue, the Laxes are also supporters of the Baycrest Centre.

Correction

We inadvertently omitted a key word in the concluding paragraph of Martin Lockshin's essay "Orthodox Jews must do some soul searching" in last week's issue. It should have read: "Orthodoxy should take steps to dissociate itself from its practitioners and leaders who advocate and teach positions that might lead to vigilante behavior. This should be done not only in order to make it easier for people like me to identify with the group. It should also be done before another Goldstein or Amir arises from Orthodox ranks..." We apologize to the author and to the readers.

Shalom Food Project funds children's breakfasts

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Breakfast, courtesy the Shalom Food Project.

TORONTO — "I always knew I could send people to a church," says Miriam Kalushner, remembering her experience as a hotline volunteer about four years ago for the non-profit organization FoodShare of Toronto, on whose board she also served.

When callers asked where the nearest food bank was, Kalushner was troubled by the lack of synagogue locations.

"I felt it was important for Jews to have a [hands-on] presence in the anti-hunger movement."

(Although Mazon Canada was formed in 1986 as "a Jewish response to hunger," its main function is to fund hands-on responses such as food banks, not to operate them.)

While Kalushner referred callers to food banks when appropriate, FoodShare focused more on giving people an alternative, with projects like breakfast clubs and community kitchens.

"Food banks are very much a band-aid situation," says Kalushner.

With all that in mind, Kalushner became the driving force behind the Shalom Food Project, which initiated and continues to fund the Plaut Manor Breakfast Club.

The club is housed in Plaut Manor, a 97-unit subsidized apartment building on Eglinton Avenue near Keele Street, that was a project of the social action committee of Holy Blossom Temple.

Since it began in April 1994, the club has provided breakfast three days a week for one to two dozen children who live in the building. There is a nominal fee and no child is ever turned away.

Breakfast always includes cold cereal, fresh fruit, milk and juice, followed by a cooked entree such as pancakes or eggs on toast. Sometimes the cook bakes muffins.

"When we can, we try to send them off with a snack," said Kalushner.

A paid cook and a team of volunteers, all of whom live in the building, run the program.

"We wanted to offer a program which would empower people," says Kalushner. Tenants who are involved include senior citizens, the physically and mentally disabled and single mothers.

"Welfare cuts will have an enormous impact on the need. This is why we want to raise more money," Kalushner adds, noting that a second project is in the works.

Although the tenants have done some of their own fundraising, the Shalom Food Project provides the greatest amount through private donations, a grant from the provincial government's child nutrition program and another from Mazon.

Darchei Noam Congregation has collected a "sizable" amount for them, and Loblaws has been a corporate donor of needed supplies.

The program costs approximately $600 to $700 a month to run.

"They are beginning to get donations themselves. For them to run it completely on their own would be our ultimate success," says Kalushner.

Jews part of Buddhist groups

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews make up 30 percent of some Buddhist groups in the United States; however, the actual number of Jews who have switched to Buddhism is not that large, an expert said here recently.

Roger Kamenetz, a well-known poet, was one of eight Jews who went to Dharamsala, the exile headquarters in northern India of the Dalai Lama of Tibet, at the request of the Dalai Lama, who wanted to know the secret of Jewish survival in exile.

An Orthodox rabbi, Irving Greenberg, and his wife, Blu Greenberg, an Orthodox feminist, were among the group, as was Paul Mendes-Flohr, professor of Modern Hebrew Thought at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, who brought a Torah as a gift.

Kamenetz, a slim, bearded professor of English at Louisiana State University, spoke to a sold-out audience of 250, mostly young people, at North York Central Library, under the auspices of Kolel, a liberal learning centre.

"His message is very important to me," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel director.

Thirty per cent of the American Jews in Buddhism (JUBUs as he referred to them) are academics, Kamenetz said.

In his book, Jews in the Lotus, Kamenetz wrote he is not a Buddhist, but his research into eastern spirituality has changed him from a secular Jew to one interested in prayer.

Asked at the meeting why Jews are attracted to Buddhism, he said, "Jews do not feel as threatened in taking on Buddhism as in converting to Christianity."

The Dala Lama's advice to the U.S. group, Kamenetz said, was to open wider the doors of Judaism and apply its traditions in a way to bring more benefit to Jews.

Jews need the equanimity offered by Buddhism and there are many ways that Judaism and Buddhism can benefit from each other, he said.

He hedged his answer to a woman who asked if it is possible to be a Buddhist and a Jew.

"A more interesting question is what new opportunities for Judaism are there in Buddhism?" he said.

The Dalai Lama was well aware of the differences in the Jewish delegation, which included members of the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform wings, Kamenetz said, because there are similar differences among his own followers.

"At one point, he turned to consult with others in his retinue," Kamenetz said, "and smiling, he turned back to us and said, 'They agree with me, they're the Orthodox ones.' "

When a Dalai Lama aide stressed that the Tibetan leader favors decorum in discussions and long pauses between replies, Kamenetz said, "He was told that we Jews have a signal when we're going to speak — we interrupt."

On a more serious note, he said the delegation fell silent when the Dalai Lama asked about the role of the Diaspora now that there is a State of Israel.

Kamenetz said he was asked to join the group visiting the Dalai Lama because of his lifelong friendship with Dr. Marc Lieberman, a Buddhist and San Francisco ophthalmologist.

Election results

Election day in the West Bank and Gaza came and went without disruption. As of this writing, the precise results are not known, but based upon early reports, Yasser Arafat and his candidates won the vast majority of votes cast by almost one million voters, representing close to 90 percent of those eligible to vote. The 88-person legislative council will be comprised mostly of Fatah-endorsed members from the PLO. Arafat is the council's ra'ees.

These results were expected. The election process imposed by the Palestinian Authority and the virtual absence of any real opposition candidates essentially ensured the electoral outcome. Thus, to the constitutionally mature cultures of the West, the elections may have been less than a full exercise in democratic freedom. But to the constitutionally embryonic culture of the West Bank and Gaza, it was more than has ever been experienced there before. Thus the truly significant result of the elections is not in the breakdown of final voting patterns, but rather in the possible breaking away, eventually, from the non-voting, non-democratic, violent, despotic and dictatorial practices that rule throughout the region. To be sure, elections for a legislative council of circumscribed domestic authority by a constituency without democratic experience or memory does not transform that society into one which is loyal to the rule of law and democratic principles. And it certainly does not allow its neighbors, yet, to forgo the construction of fences. Therefore, to put too fine a polish on the holding of the elections would be a form of self-deception; but to ignore even the minimal degree of polish that these elections represent, would be a form of self-imposed blindness.

In the recent issue of the Jerusalem Report, Isabel Kershner reports that "some Palestinians, as well as foreign observers, are convinced that the elections, and the council that will be formed, hold the seeds of a new era of Palestinian democracy." Only time will tell whether seeds of democracy were indeed planted last Saturday and if so, whether Palestinian behavior proved to be a hospitable climate.

Time has proven, though, that the inclination to go to war is diminished between democracies. Thus, it is in the interests of everyone striving for peace in the region to try to ensure that the seeds of Palestinian democracy take root and hold, though it may take many years.

The newly elected ra'ees of the legislative council can prove to the world, and more importantly, to Israelis, that he is indeed interested in nurturing democracy and not simply in planting a dangerous irredentist state alongside Israel's narrow waist, by taking immediate steps to revoke all the offensive and hateful provisions of the Palestinian National Covenant calling for Israel's destruction. He has promised to do so within 60 days of the election.

The elections have been held. The soil has been made ready. New winds are blowing. The sun of a better dawn has arisen. We are all watching.

Election coverage

We cannot conclude our observations regarding last week's election without commenting on its particularly disappointing coverage in last Sunday's Toronto Star. The Star's reporter decided to make purported Israeli army intimidation a key focus of the story rather than the elections themselves. He began the second paragraph of his story with a bold assertion about " Israeli army intimidation in this tense city." In the middle of the story, he quickly but revealingly glossed over a violent incident directed at a young Jewish girl. "In Hebron, known as a Hamas stronghold, a Palestinian stabbed a 15-year-old settler, lightly wounding her." The absurdity of referring to the 15-year-old as a "settler" betrayed the writer's bias. For him the term "settler" is akin to "outlaw," or worse. We are left to wonder, what is the writer's cut-off age to qualify a child as being "settler"? If a 15-year-old is a settler, would a child of 12 or 10 or 8 years old also be a "settler"?

By presenting as fact what should have been presented as allegation, by failing to provide any, let alone appropriate context for the presence of such large numbers of soldiers in Hebron, by focusing the story on and filing it from the most delicate location in the West Bank, and by using "loaded" vocabulary, the reporter betrayed his own biases. He thus left his story bereft of the bare minimum required of good reporting: balance, fairness and integrity.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Jan. 22, 1847, Reverend Abraham de Sola, newly arrived in Montreal from England, began his tenure as rabbi of the Shearith Israel Spanish and Portuguese Congregation, a post he held until his death in 1882. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

'Still missing the point'

In its editorial of Dec. 21, 1995, entitled "In 1996," The CJN cautioned us that "If Quebec separates, Canada ends." This, it continued, "must be stated over and over again, because some people are still missing the point." An article published in the same issue of the paper, "We must prevent the destruction of Canada," also repeated this warning.

Although I live in that part of Canada which doubtless would feel the effects of Quebec independence more severely than any other part of the country, I am indeed one of those "still missing the point." Even if Quebec were to depart, Canada would, in size, population, economic strength and various other indicators, remain one of the world's larger and more prosperous states, comparable to, say, Australia. There is no reason to assume it could not survive simply because one of its 10 provinces chose to go its own way.

Do you mean to suggest that Canadians in the rest of the country cannot conceive of retaining their sense of nationhood without Quebec? Are you implying — for this seems to follow logically from your premise — that we would be absorbed by the United States? Do you really think Vancouver would immediately become indistinguishable from Seattle, Toronto from Buffalo, and Halifax from Boston, in a Canada without Quebec? If so, I can only conclude that you must think anglophone Canada a very weak hothouse plant, one so delicate and artificial it cannot survive without the occasional infusion of Québécois francophone culture.

On the contrary, without the endless and divisive "national unity" debate that has preoccupied us for some three decades, to the detriment of other pressing economic and social issues, a case could be made that Canada would become a stronger nation, and not at all one which would disintegrate and presumably, become absorbed by our southern neighbor. We would be spared the ceaseless quest for more powers by Quebec nationalists — including those in the provincial Liberal party as well as péquistes — and endless constitutional wrangling.

In any case, it is rather late in the day, after 30 years of accommodating and placating these people, to suddenly worry about "losing the country." The Chrétien government, like every one of its Liberal and Tory predecessors since Lester Pearson's administration, adheres to the doctrine of Canada as a compact between "two founding nations." As anyone who has taken an introductory course in political science is aware, being defined as a nation in the modern world, includes the right to "national self-determination," or sovereign statehood. Lucien Bouchard, for one, has learned this lesson well.

As for our Jewish compatriots in Quebec: I am a former Montrealer, who in 1982 co-authored an article in the Jerusalem Post regarding the potential crisis facing our community in that province, for which I was not only denounced by the nationalist newspaper Le Devoir, but also chastised by the leadership of the Quebec region of Canadian Jewish Congress; they were pressured into denying that there was any serious problem facing Jews and other non-French Canadian "ethnics." I drew the appropriate conclusions and, like thousands of other Montreal Jews, left the province.

Education 'craps' out at casino

I am disturbed by the effect casinos are having on students. I recently visited the Montreal casino and noticed a disproportionate number of university students at the tables. Like myself, most of these students cannot afford the losses that they will inevitably incur.

It appears to me that students are the victims of these "high stakes" games. Students are easily lured to casinos with false visions of achieving the "American-Canadian Dream" overnight. The casinos' close proximity to most campuses only serves to reinforce this problem. Many of the students are gambling away the money they need to attend university. Often, these funds have been provided through government loans.

Common enemy unites Jews

The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin is but a symptom of how the global Jewish community is fractured today.

How very different from 10 years ago, when secular and religious Jews stood shoulder to shoulder outside Soviet embassies and consultates and marched in Simchat Torah rallies to demonstrate their belief that Soviet Jews should be free.

We Jews won our battle with the most powerful totalitarian nation in the world. How tragic that we need a common enemy in order to be united.

500 Jewish students at McMaster

I would like to correct a statistic in an article (CJN, Jan. 4) about the formation of a Jewish Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity at McMaster University. The report said that "McMaster has a student population of 15,000 of whom only an estimated 125 are Jewish."

In fact, the Jewish Students Association has 125 students on their mailing list. However, we estimate that there are between 400 and 500 Jewish students on campus.

A daughter remembers a momentous debate

By SHIRA HERZOG

Like many significant events, the historic debate between Israel's ambassador to Canada, Yaacov Herzog, and renowned British historian Arnold Toynbee, came about almost by chance.

On Jan. 28, 1961, Herzog was called by a journalist who had been present at a guest lecture given by Toynbee at McGill University earlier in the day. Toynbee, the reporter said, had compared the treatment of Arab civilians by Israel in 1947 and 1948 to the Nazis' treatment of Jews, and he wanted a reaction from Herzog.

The 39-year-old ambassador was indignant, offended and pained by the analogy. He immediately called for a retraction by the senior historian, or as the alternative, for a debate between them at the same location.

The following day, Toynbee accepted the challenge to a debate, but responded that he would be leaving Canada on Feb. 1. Herzog agreed to debate him on Jan. 31, and spent the next 48 hours studying Toynbee's copious writings on history and civilization. I was 8 years old at the time, and I recall the tension-filled weekend that preceded the debate.

The Canadian Jewish community responded to media reports about the planned event with concern and apprehension. Community leaders urged Herzog to withdraw his challenge, although Toynbee had refused to retract his statement, in a meeting with the same Jewish delegation. Herzog's superiors in Israel, including then-foreign minister Golda Meir, said nothing at all and their silence spoke volumes about their concern over the outcome of the contest. Herzog, for his part, was convinced that the analogy could not be left unanswered, as it undermined the moral foundations of Israel's being, and also diminished the unique evil that the Holocaust of European Jewry represented.

On Jan. 31, the debate took place at McGill's Hillel House before a packed audience and it was later broadcast on CBC Radio. For Canadian Jewish students who were present, it became an unforgettable, formative moment in their development as Jews and Zionists. The debate speaks for itself. Herzog challenged not only the objectionable analogy, but also Toynbee's questioning of the Jewish people's historic right to Israel and his description of the Jewish people as a "fossil" nation. He was logical, eloquent and relentless in his pursuit, and never once betrayed the sea of emotion that was swirling beneath his calm exterior.

He felt obliged and privileged to defend his people, his state and his heritage, and he did so with pride, dignity and reason. Among those present, the consensus was that Herzog clearly had the upper hand on all three issues of substance.

The debate unleashed a flood of congratulatory reactions in Israel and Canada. Israel Radio broadcast it with simultaneous translation into Hebrew, and letters, telegrams and editorials hailed the ambassador's achievement as a seminal moment in the history of the young state.

For Herzog, the debate became the first of a series of encounters and conversations with Toynbee over a decade, in which they pursued their dialogue on history and morality. In 1968, Herzog told an audience about his exchange with Toynbee shortly after the 1967 Six Day War.

Toynbee said: "When I heard your soldiers at the Western Wall on the radio, I began to grasp the nature of your bonds with this city of Jerusalem and this country."

"I asked him," continued Herzog, " 'How did you understand? The BBC broadcast the event in Hebrew. The soldiers don't speak English. How could you understand them?' "

Toynbee replied, "In such things, I have historical antennae. I heard the voices and I understood."

In rereading the debate a generation after it was held, I was struck by two thoughts. The first is the distance we have travelled as a people and as a nation since 1961. The debate was held in Israel's 13th year of independence, when the morality of its cause and the justification for its very existence were still challenged — long before the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and the reunification of Jerusalem. At the time, Israel faced not only the threat of war by its Arab neighbors, but a moral and legal assault from prominent quarters in the western world.

The second is the relevance that Herzog's words continue to have, even in a changed world and for a new generation, for whom the polemics of the past are at best a memory. Herzog's defence of his people's honor and his state's origins rings passionate and true even as Israel is embarked on the road to peace with its neighbors — a peace for which he prayed and persisted in all his diplomatic endeavors.

Ambassador Yaacov Herzog

For Israel and the Jewish world, the lasting legacy of the Herzog-Toynbee debate is the price invoked by the successful challenge to the indictment that was lodged against the Jewish people from an academic rostrum of world repute. The gauntlet had been thrown down before the Jewish people and the truth of history, and a young ambassador picked it up on a public platform and confronted Toynbee as his equal.

For me, there is an additional, personal legacy that is no less important — the manner in which the debate was conducted and the spirit of mutual respect that prevailed throughout an intellectual and spiritual contest of the deepest import.

Postcript: After Herzog's untimely death in 1972, Toynbee wrote to Herzog's wife, Pnina, to express his condolences. He noted the civility, tolerance and understanding that had characterized their dialogue over the years, although they often disagreed on matters of substance.

Shira Herzog is a regular columnist with The CJN.

The transcript of the debate is more than 25 pages. The following excerpt from their exchange is a "taste" of the conviction and the fire in the Ambassador's words.

The second point is that through the experience of this Holocaust in Europe, our will was strengthened to do everything in our capacity so that never again would such a tragedy befall our people. But how can the two events — the destruction of one-third of our people and the Arab refugee problem created through a war started by the Arabs themselves — be mentioned in the same breath? Should we pass an amendment to Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations on the right of self-defence: an amendment to say that if you are attacked you may resist, but remember, no matter what you suffer in the process, if the man attacking you suffers, you will be condemned by history as having been affected by Nazi influence.

As a diplomat representing my country, and my experience in this field is in contemporary times, I have not studied history as deeply as you have. I would ask you in all objectivity as a historian: our concept of our life down the ages — I could sum it up in a verse from the Psalms, "Lo amut ki echyeh va'asapper maasey yah," "I shall not die but I shall live!" A fossil does not die, but he also does not live. Here we part ways. And as we live, and through our survival down the ages we see the hand of Providence, we have the sense of survival under Providence and we move ahead as we pray for spiritual fulfilment.

Here lies the basic difference between us. You say: "You do not die (why is not clear) but you do not live. No continuity in terms of creative life and thought. You sort of slipped out of the stream of civilization to some remote island and got stuck there. Now and then your voice is heard as it shrieks at the passing ships."

We say: "No, we have been in the stream. We have been in the stream in a distinctive sense: in our survival, in our prayers and in our hope, in our attachment to our land and in our belief in the fulfilment of immortal prophecy." But that is an issue and I am not a historian. As I say, others are debating this with you.

But I would ask you, as a modern Israeli representing my country and one who has seen the country coming to life and independence, from the academic historical analysis point of view, as you scan the pages of history, is there no significance in the following facts, which cannot be denied:

Number 1: Of all the ancient peoples of the Middle East, we are the only one living in continuity today in the Middle East, speaking the same language, practising the same religious faith.

Rabbi Johanan Ben Zakkai, to whom you devote much attention, he and Rabbi Akiva and Bar Kochba — if they were to come to life and could live with us — would not find a dichotomy that snapped them asunder. There is a continuity of experience.

Number 2: After this passage through the Valley of Death down the ages — and you yourself have described in your book the corpses and ashes of the Diaspora — we have come to life in our time. We have come to life without rancor, despite all the past, between us and our Arab neighbors. I can assure you that you will see this if you come to Israel. There is no rancor, there is no hatred. There is grief, but there is a hope for peace every day, and there is a confidence that it will come. Nor is there rancor to nations across the world. This very vitality of life, of survival without rancor, this too, I would submit, has a certain significance in terms of historical analysis.

Number 3: After these thousands of years we have assembled people from 70 lands. The Yemenites from the remote deserts of the Yemen, who were cut off from the main stream of civilization for over 2,000 years, Jews from Morocco, Jews from East and Western Europe's Nazi death camps, Jews from the remote hinterlands of India have all come together, and they have founded a common nation spontaneously. Has that link no vitality? Was that a fossil? Is that how a fossil reacts? All these particles of the fossil have come together. We feel as one.

Finally, the question of democracy. After all this experience we are the only viable democracy in terms of the Israel-Arab complex in the area. The fact is that today many new nations from Africa and Asia look to us for guidance and cooperation, and they find in our experiment and in our enterprises something that draws them.

So we do have a message for the world and not, sir, as you suggest, that our message ceased some 2,300 years ago. What I am trying to say is very vividly expressed by Professor Lewis Mumford in Conduct of Life. He says: "The binding force of an ethical force based on purpose has been dramatically confirmed in the history of the Jews. Its practical consummation in our time perhaps merits our special note."

We believe that our survival is an index of the supremacy of spiritual over material value. We believe in all humility and thanks to a merciful Providence that it has a relevance to the broad experience of mankind today. I would ask you, sir, in all respect, if you don't think all these elements have any basis on which you could possibly reconsider your concept of us as a fossil, non-creative, but which suddenly fell out — neither dead nor alive these past 2,000 years?

'Fashion tips' — all in one sitting

By VIVA PRESS

I confess. I was eavesdropping on total strangers. I know it is impolite, but I'm sure I'm not the only one who does it. To justify it, eavesdropping is just another form of listening. I learned in one of my print classes that to listen in on conversations can be a useful tool, a tool that helps journalists to develop a story. The Canadian Reporter, a manual that deals with news writing and reporting techniques, claims that listening is an essential skill that journalists need to develop when collecting news.

By Viva Press

I think the act of eavesdropping would not be considered so disreputable if it did not already have a pejorative connotation. To eavesdrop is to be privy to a conversation that is not meant for one's ears. But if one were to separate the act from the resonances that have grown around the word, it might even be acceptable. If I overhear other people's conversations, I'll listen to them. I don't publicize the fact that I'm listening, but does that necessarily mean I'm listening in private?

For those of you who have never eavesdropped or listened to another person's conversation, I'd like to tell you that it can be very interesting. I have learned a lot about others in this way.

Since the act of listening is considered distasteful and even dishonest, one must not show any emotion when listening in.

Let me explain why I bring this topic up. When I was in New York for two days in mid-December, I found myself deeply engrossed in someone else's conversation. At the time I did not think I would use it as material for an article; rather I was surprised that the topic under discussion could reach such heights that I had to continue listening.

After spending four or five hours on my feet at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, I walked for a few blocks up Fifth Avenue to the Jewish Museum to see an exhibition of Russian Art. The museum was packed.

The exhibition, Russian Jewish Artists in a Century of Change 1890-1990, chronicles the last 100 years in the history of Russian art and Jewish culture. Many of the paintings portrayed the changing attitudes towards the Jewish artists; they were both accepted by their Russian compatriots and also rejected during the course of the political and social upheavals of this 100-year period. The exhibition took me two hours to view and my feet were in dire need of a rest.

A vacant seat on a cushioned bench called out to me. The bench was situated between the entrance and exit of the exhibition, which one followed in a circular path. While I sat on the bench and leaned against the wall, I could not help but overhear the conversation that was taking place a couple of paces away from me.

Four people, all elegantly dressed, were talking. The two men wore stylish pants and button-down shirts. Both women were wearing slacks and sweaters and had mink coats slung over their arms.

Their exchange did not sound frivolous in any way; rather they were discussing their topic in depth and with great seriousness.

Of course, I missed the first words, but what caught my attention was when one of the women exclaimed that a mink coat should not be worn with jeans. Her husband agreed. The other couple, however, maintained that a mink coat was perfectly compatible with jeans if it was a short mink and the jeans were of light color.

The first woman, not wanting to insult her counterpart, said she would personally never wear jeans with a mink but conceded that under certain conditions, the second woman was right. The caveat she added was that the person wearing the short mink with jeans had to be skinny.

I was intrigued that this topic of mix 'n' match jeans and mink could actually become the basis of such a heartfelt discussion.

Consensus was reached that dark jeans and mink must not be worn together, that long mink and any colored jeans are unacceptable, but that jeans and mink should preferably not be worn together at all. And they all agreed adamantly, woman one and two having compromised on an area of potential conflict, that if one wants to wear jeans then one must be skinny and wear a short mink with light colored jeans, but definitely no mink at all with stone-washed or tapered jeans.

Can you imagine what I might have missed if I wasn't eavesdropping? I got all of my fashion tips in one sitting. I have the jeans. All I need is the mink — well, a faux mink.

The first woman then said that she and her husband should go finish the exhibit as the museum was soon closing. The second woman and her husband responded with their goodbyes, saying, "It was nice meeting you."

Nice meeting you? They didn't even know each other but had managed to establish a rapport discussing mink and jeans.

My feet still hurt. I sat and waited a little longer. I thought about the paintings I had seen and wondered if perhaps I would overhear another conversation that would give me tips on sore feet.

Doubts about Song of Peace

Just before Yitzhak Rabin was murdered, the crowd had chanted A Song for Peace. Immediately after the assassination, singing it was believed to be an expression of solidarity with the peace process and what the late prime minister had stood for, a kind of second national anthem.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Unfortunately the text of the song does not qualify for such high honors. Written in Hebrew by Yaakov Rotblit, it does indeed express a deepfelt longing for peace — and no one can quarrel with that.

Unfortunately, the English translation distorts the original, apparently because the translators thought that Diaspora Jews might be offended by some of the words Rotblit had written. Thus, the author wrote one thing; the translation fudges it when it comes to religion.

'Softening' the content

The fact is that Rotblit wrote a straightforward secular song, the kind one would hear in the old socialist kibbutzim: Prayers will not get us what we really need and singing the songs of Hallel (by the Psalmist) will bring no one back from the grave. The author makes his point succinctly and the success of the song mirrors the large number of secularists in Israel. For them, prayer and God hold out little hope for success. You had better forget about them and do what you must for yourself.

However the translators did not think it politic to render the Hebrew according to the author's intent. In one line they translate: "So sing a song for peace. Don't whisper your wish." But the Hebrew doesn't say, "your wish;" it says, "Don't whisper a prayer."

I object to the "softening" of the song for the benefit of the Jews ignorant of Hebrew. Let secularists read in it what they want, while believers know that prayer enlarges our capacity to do what we can accomplish.

Which leads me to a related subject, the widening gulf between the religious and non-religious portions of Israel's public. That gulf has existed for a long time and many of us have feared that the real problem the nation faces is not its external enemies, but its internal division. Subsequent to the assassination of Rabin by a student of Bar-Ilan University (an Orthodox institution), anyone who could be called "religious" was demonized as a potential murderer or an accessory to the deed.

Wearing or not wearing a kippah is of course not indicative of a person's character or politics. Ever since 1967, I have believed that ruling another people was not a fit occupation for modern Jews, and I have therefore supported the peace process as a matter of principle. I have no quarrel with those who believe that the holiness of the land comes before all else — I respect their belief, but it is not mine. This difference however must be fought out with words and arguments and not with insults from either side.

That is another reason why the Song for Peace is not a fit medium for expressing the national hope of the Jewish people.

Jews must 'agree to disagree'

By ILAN GEWURZ AND DANA DEMB

What would we do if we could travel back to the time before the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, with the knowledge that we have at present? More than just preventing the actual assassination attempt, would we be able to create a reality in which such an act would not be possible?

CAMPUS VOICES

Sitting down and talking rationally to Yigal Amir would probably have done little to change his convictions. However, a true dialogue between groups with different political or religious beliefs might have created a climate free of finger-pointing and the feeling of marginalization experienced by some groups. Perhaps in a reality of mutual respect and civil discourse, the tragedy would have been unimaginable.

In the immediate aftermath of the assassination, Jewish communities around the world realized the danger in the "us and them" mentality, and the issue of Jewish unity took centre stage. Many political and religious leaders initially responded to the divisions within the community by calling on the Jewish people to begin a process of soul-searching. Sadly, however, the discourse has been characterized predominately by hateful finger-pointing which has only served to accentuate the divide that already existed within Israeli society.

Perhaps the reason these calls for introspection did not bring about a transformation in intra-commual relations is that introspection in itself is not enough. Self-reflection within a group that shares beliefs and perspectives will not better the relations between groups with opposing political or religious agendas. What is needed here is not unity of vision, but unity of mutually accepted "rules of the game." We should seek a shared framework within which Jews from all walks of life can "agree to disagree."

Through a process of honest communication and personal interactions, we can step beyond the stereotypes which are intrinsic in the "us and them" mentality. As Jews we must respect each other's opinions and know that while we may not agree, we are bound to one another by a shared past and a common destiny. Clearly the covenant that unites us is far more significant than the differences which divide us.

The process of communal healing begins with openness and readiness to listen to the views of others, and a recognition that different ideas are not necessarily illegitimate ideas. We must transcend our stereotypes. An Israeli prepared to trade land for peace should not be written off as a traitor; a settler should not be branded a religious fanatic. It is by truly listening to the perspectives of others and understanding their concerns that we can develop respect, despite disagreement. This can best be achieved though face-to-face Jewish-Jewish dialogue.

There have been some attempts, both in the Diaspora and in Israel, to create such dialogues. In Montreal, for example, a panel discussion titled Peace in the House of Israel, was held in early December, organized by the Tiffereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, along with the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) and in association with Israeli consul general to Montreal, Daniel Gal. The panel brought together Jewish intellectuals representing different views along the political and religious spectrum, to address the many tensions facing the Jewish people and the State of Israel. The success of the event demonstrated that it was possible to exchange differing perspectives in a respectful, constructive setting.

Efforts to expand the process of Jewish dialogue have reached the student level as well. At a recent intra-community student meeting, we quickly realized how much we had to learn from one another. In explaining why she had come to the dialogue group, one student said she could not identify with religious Jews and often felt herself resenting them. She said she hoped to gain insight into a religious student's perspective. Throughout the discussion, the need for many of us to adjust our previously conceived stereotypes was apparent. The dialogue helped us begin to confront some of these dangerous brandings.

Through the mutual understanding and respect which these sorts of dialogue create, we can dare to harbor the hope that the deep divisions within Israeli society and Jewish Diaspora communities will be narrowed.

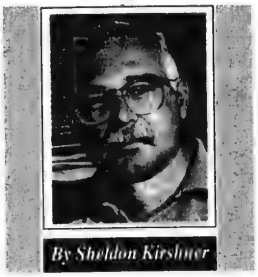
The Kirshner File

Authors examine Spain's multicultural past

For centuries, Spain was the most tolerant nation in Europe. But in the 14th century, Spain changed drastically, becoming a bastion of intolerance as the Inquisition took root.



By Sheldon Kirshner

The chief victims of this astonishing transformation were the Jews. They had long enjoyed the fruits of Spanish society, particularly under Muslim rule.

Under the threat of death, Jews were forced to convert to Christianity en masse. The final indignity, the mass expulsion of Jews, occurred in 1492.

These catastrophic events are described with verve by Erna Paris, a Toronto writer, in a splendid new book, The End of Days (Lester, $28.95). It is not the only volume on the subject to have been published recently.

The Origins of the Inquisition (Random House, $70), a scholarly and formalistic tome written by Benzion Netanyahu, the father of Benjamin, the leader of the Likud party, is also available.

Paris did not choose her topic accidentally, as she recounted in an interview. Social and political upheavals fascinate her. Ten years ago, for example, she wrote Unhealed Wounds: France and the Klaus Barbie Affair.

Paris began her investigation of the Inquisition in 1986, in the midst of finishing a book about Israel, The Garden and the Gun. Three years later, Paris — who reads Spanish fluently — went to Spain for further research.

Originally, she had flirted with the idea of completing The End of Days by 1992, the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of Spanish Jewry. In retrospect, she is glad she failed to meet this deadline. For The End of Days, she now believes, probably would have been buried under an avalanche of books marking Columbus' voyage to the Americas in 1492. "I wanted my book to be something permanent rather than something for just the year 1992."

Clearly, Paris has succeeded. The End of Days is compellingly readable and accessible, marked by thorough research. "I could have written 10,000 pages," she said. "But I had to be ruthless with my material. I wanted a popular book. I had to throw out all kinds of wonderful, tangential stuff."

One of its dominant themes is the extent to which Muslims, or Moors, enriched and enlivened Spain. Paris juxtaposes the Moors, who championed liberalism and multiculturalism, with that of the Visigoths, a barbarian tribe from the north whose 300-year reign was characterized by a fidelity to ethnic exclusivity and anti-Semitism.

And, as she pointed out, the Golden Age of Spanish Jewry, from the 10th to the 12th centuries, coincided with the apogee of Muslim dominance on the Iberian peninsula.

"It's a fabulous multicultural model," said Paris, referring to Muslim Spain. "There was no coercion to assimilate."

But the pluralistic character of Spain was successively challenged by two hostile forces — the Spanish Visigoth-Christian clergy and the fundamentalistic Almohad Arabs from North Africa.

Yet, contrary to myth, the Christian monarchs who gradually reconquered Spanish territory from the Muslims did not immediately persecute Jews and Moors. Indeed, they initially adopted the tolerant policies of the Muslims and, as Paris notes, relations between the three groups were "amiable and easy."

The seeds of intolerance were sown by a confluence of factors: attempts by pious Christians to "purify" a church which had lost its moral authority; accusations of poisoning wells levelled against Jews amid the ravages of the Black Plague; attacks on Jewish tax collectors in the service of kings; endemic political instability; and, last but not least, efforts to unify Spain.

As anti-Semitism seeped into secular politics, the growing ethnocentric mood was fanned by two influential clerics — Ferran Martinez and Vincente Ferrer.

The intolerance, which climaxed in 1391 and peaked again in 1420 before exploding in 1492, prompted 600,000 or more Jews to convert. These figures are, however, impossible to verify, Paris said.

The converts, some of whom became exceedingly rich and powerful, were known as Conversos, New Christians or Marranos. One such convert was Pablo de Santa Maria (Solomon Halevi), who had been the chief rabbi of Burgos before being appointed the bishop of that city.

Even Ferdinand and Isabella, who signed the expulsion order in 1492, valued and employed New Christians in their administration, Paris observes.

Netanyahu explains that the mass conversions of Jews, beginning in 1391, created a new social entity in Spain. Legally freed from restrictions that had limited the Jews' economic activities, the converts entered fields which had been hitherto exclusively occupied by Old Christians. As a result, they aroused jealousy and resentment.

The hatred of the Conversos was exacerbated by the belief that they were false Christians clinging to Jewish rituals and customs. Torquemada, the grand inquisitor and himself the scion of Conversos, was convinced that the Jewish presence in Spain was inimical to Christian purity. Jews, he believed, were luring back Conversos to Judaism.

In fact, the majority of New Christians did not integrate well and in reality, were neither Christians nor Jews. "It is certain that most of them were extremely reluctant to stop performing all the commandments, and even more so to take part in Christian rites and ceremonies," writes Netanyahu.

Taken as a whole, however, the Conversos were "devoutly Christian" and happy to be so, until they became the object of vicious persecution, he comments. "So Christianized were [the Conversos] in their own eyes that they failed to see why they should be called New Christians."

According to Netanyahu, Jews viewed the converts as "perverts, opportunists and careerists."

Both Paris and Netanyahu argue that the widespread animus against the Conversos was also a function of blood and race. "Purity of blood" (limpieza) turned into a national obsession. As Paris observes: "Blood purity cracked open the fundamental medieval notion that baptism alone determined who 'belonged' to the majority culture and who did not."

Eventually, virtually all Conversos were tarred with the brush of "Jewishness." Between 1481 (when the Inquisition clicked into place) and 1520, writes Paris, most of the famous Converso families which had occupied the highest positions and had intermarried with the Old Christian aristocracy were destroyed.

As for the Jews who had steadfastly resisted conversion, Ferdinand and Isabella protected them until the very last moment. But on March 31, 1492, the royal couple succumbed to the blandishments of the zealots and signed the Edict of Expulsion.

When the numbers are added up, Paris said, one-third of Spanish Jewry converted, one-third were murdered and one-third emigrated. With the Jews gone, the Conversos were less vulnerable to the Inquisition, whose ultimate objective was to purify the faith against heresy and to unify Spain. Not until 1834 was the Inquisition finally abolished.

Paris, whose book launch was co-sponored by the Spanish government, claims that interest in the Inquisition runs high in Spain today. This is the case, she said, because Spain wishes to recover the glory of its multicultural past and because it has become somewhat fashionable to trace one's ancestry to Conversos.

Paris regrets that the tide has turned against multiculturalism in Canada. Perhaps, she cautioned, we're heading into an era of intolerance, the likes of which engulfed Spain over 600 years ago.

The End of Days and The Origins of the Inqusition, therefore, stand as a warning that the social harmony Canadians presently enjoy and take for granted is not carved in stone and can be eroded.

Jewish Life

No need for religious Jews to apologize for who we are

By JULIEN BAUER
Special to The CJN

I am a Jew, I am a religious Jew, I am a Zionist Jew, and if you expect me to apologize for what I am, you are in for a very long wait.

Guest Voices

A few years ago, I used to say these words as an opening remark when presenting a pro-Israel viewpoint to hostile audiences, a mixture of anti-democrats, leftists, Third-Worldists, PLO admirers, Israel bashers. Most of the listeners understood the message. In my worst nightmares, I never anticipated that, one day, I would use the same words with Jewish audiences.

The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin has created a situation where Religious Zionism is under attack, guilty for all our problems, and should "cleanse" itself from its belief system.

The media present the late Rabin as perfect, above humanity. Forgotten is the fact that his peace process was a gamble, both legitimate and legitimately criticized. Forgotten is his role in the division of the Jewish people by dismissing and insulting his opponents. Forgotten is the fact that Rabin was the first prime minister of Israel who did not attend and did not send ministers to attend funerals for civilian victims of Palestinian terrorism. Forgotten is the real Rabin, a human being with qualities and weaknesses.

A new dogma teaches that all Religious Zionist Jews are collectively guilty for Yigal Amir's act of murder. So well accepted is the concept of collective responsibility that some Israelis have chosen to discriminate even against kipah-wearing soldiers trying to hitchhike. The pressure is so intense that leaders of Religious Zionism feel obligated to buy space in the New York Times to explain why they have to atone for their presumed guilt.

To be a Religious Zionist has become a liability. It is neither religiously nor politically correct. The only correct Orthodoxy, if there is any, is the ghettoized anti-Zionist kind. Black hats, maybe; knitted kippah, No. The only politically correct attitude is to accept, without any reservation, the Labor-Meretz vision. To disagree, to criticize, or even to ask questions, is tantamount to being a heathen or a schismatic.

In such an atmosphere, it is not easy to keep one's sanity. I will try. I do believe that Rabin's assassination was an abomination. I do believe that being religious and Zionist does not make me a killer or an accomplice to murder. I do not need sanctimonious advice about the unity of the Jewish people.

Well before the assassination, I was engaged in Montreal in pro-Israel activities with people I was supposed to be at odds with, or so I was told. How can you work with people who eat non-kosher food on Yom Kippur? How can they work with someone who wears a kippah? My answer was, and is: How can I not work with Jews who share a sense of ahavat Israel, of love of the Jewish People? I did not say al chet (I am guilty) then, and I do not say al chet (I am guilty) now.

My ancestors, like the ancestors of all European Jews, could have led an easy life by becoming Christians. They chose to remain Jewish. I owe it to them, and to my children, to remain, without arrogance and without shame, what I am, a Religious Zionist Jew.

Risk of new epidemics rules against baboon transplants

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

Is baboon marrow kosher? That is the question raised by the recent transplantation of baboon marrow into AIDS-infected Jeff Getty at San Francisco General Hospital. The theory is that since baboons are impervious to HIV, the cells will work with Getty's body to fortify his immune system and fight the virus.

Comparative Law

Is it permissible to place animal parts — and non-kosher animal parts at that — in a human body? No problem. The biblical ban is only on eating foods that are not kosher; it is not prohibited to derive other types of benefits from them. (The exception to this rule is a mixture of milk and meat which, in addition to not eating, one may not cook or derive any benefit from.) Thus, pancreatic cells from pigs that secrete insulin and other porcine tissues and organs such as fetal brain tissue, heart valves, hearts, livers and blood vessels may be used.

Is it permissible to submit to hazardous or experimental medical procedures when accepted therapies have failed? May a person endanger a definite short life span (chayei sha'ah) in favor of a possibly successful procedure that might lengthen his life? The Talmud, Avodah Zara 27b, says yes, basing itself on the biblical account of the four lepers recorded in II Kings 8, which describes the siege of Samaria by the Syrians.

With no available food, four lepers reason that if they do nothing, they will certainly die. "If we say, 'We will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there; and if we sit still here, we die also. Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Arameans; if they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we shall but die.' "

There are debates among rabbinic authorities as to the likelihood of success necessary to permit such procedures. One authority requires at least a 50 per cent chance of success, one accepts any significant chance as sufficient and another accepts even one in a thousand.

And how long is chayei sha'ah, life of limited duration? The Ahiezer accepts a life expectancy of six months, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein accepts a life expectancy of 12.

The larger question in the case of the baboon marrow, however, is not the danger that it presents to Getty, but the possible medical disaster it might unleash on the entire human population. Virues and bacteria that are successfully confined in the animal world may be uncontrollable when introduced to humans. HIV, for example, is a disaster that originally started in monkeys and somehow was transferred to people.

Is it proper to permit such a procedure, which has the real possibility of endangering many human lives?

Jewish law is very concerned about potential dangers to life. It permitted the violation of the Sabbath in order to extinguish life-threatening fires and to capture, and even kill, dangerous animals. It prohibited activities that were presumed unhealthy or dangerous and, while many of our activities include some degree of hazard, it allowed people to opt to rely upon ~~divine~~ protection only in those activities that are widely accepted and practised.

In addition, while there is an obligation to save another's life, no one is obligated to risk his own life in the process. There is a debate as to whether a person is obligated, or even permitted, to save another if there is a safek sakkanah, potential danger to his own life.

Thus, it seems to me, that while Jewish law would allow Getty to accept transplants of animal tissue, and in the final stages of AIDS to submit to hazardous, experimental procedures, it would not accept the potential risks of new viruses and epidemics to which the general population might potentially be exposed and which give rise to great concern amongst virologists and others.

Rabbi Dratch is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

Jewish Life

Judaism must stress positive aspects

By RABBI ROGER V. PAVEY

Judaism is not flourishing. Many Jews, especially our young, are defecting. They retain the label "Jews," but find little meaning in it or in a faith and way of life that stopped developing with bar and bat mitzvah. And though a few find fulfilment in a return to Orthodoxy, the baalei tshuvah are a tiny minority.

Mainstream Jewish life is not very inspiring. It all too often seems like unending committees playing politics and obsessed with issues — like anti-Semitism, Israel, fundraising and intermarriage — that are important, but seemingly not too relevant to the need of so many of our brightest to find purpose in being Jewish, meaning in their spirituality.

Maybe we should start trying to put forward the positive reasons for staying Jewish and wanting to live a Jewish life.

There is, of course, a minority for whom this is not an issue, for whom a Torah-centred lifestyle is the norm. However, they are a minority. Most Jews do not really believe that the mitzvot are divine legislation. Respectful though they might be of their observant brothers, they have no intention of adopting such a lifestyle for themselves. To speak to the majority of Jews today in North America of a return to a halachic observance is a waste of breath.

There is another possibility.

Traditionally, the moral and spiritual values of Judaism were implicit in the act. By actually doing the mitzvah we learned Jewish theology and ethics. It was, for example, by lighting Shabbat candles that we learned such values as family harmony, rest and holiness.

However, this is no longer the case, when many, if not most, Jews do not do the act any more. Nor I think, will it become the reality again. Rather, I suggest, it might now be time to reverse the process; that is, to spell out the values we want to preserve and teach through Jewish tradition, so that, instead of the act teaching the value, the value comes to inspire the act.

Judaism is the linking of humankind with the transcendant, so that we become partners in the healing of all creation, including ourselves. Our tradition has learned values, moral and spiritual, to this end and expressed them in daily living. We must now first state those values and show clearly that they relate to the needs of Jews as individuals and in community. Then we can embed those values in the process of living by acting them out.

The tremendous riches of our traditional sources, biblical and rabbinic, are the text from which we learn how to live. This is Torah, a paradigm of values lived in ordinary life, "normative holiness."

We are now reading the Torah account of becoming free through the miracle of the Exodus that we shall celebrate in the seder. At the seder, we also begin to count down to Shavuot. For, in entering the covenant at Sinai, we become free in a richer sense. We become not just free from, from the slavery in Egypt; we also become free for, for the observance of Torah. Anyone can be a freed slave; we have to go on to become Jews.

We have to discover the real freedom, which is not to do anything we want, but to explore the values of Torah and their application to life in terms of personal and communal spirituality.

Unless we speak out about the positive value of being Jewish, we shall lose our future. We must not be Jews out of fear or apathy or inertia, but because we want to be, because we have something to say to the whole world, and in doing so, we will discover the meaning of our own identity.

There are Jews who were born into the House of Israel and there are Jews who have joined the House of Israel. Every Jew must become a Jew, not by accident, but by choice; not by label, but by commitment.

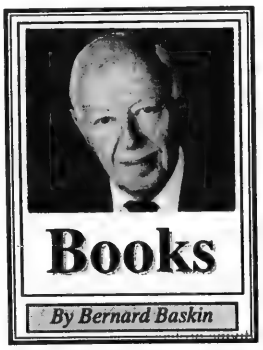
Good books a true delight



Into a new year, this columnist wants to assure uncertain and burdened readers that no pleasure has ever been found — on a sustained level — equal to that of reading good books. They offer us knowledge, distraction, delight, strength and solace.

Some books, of course, can be read in an hour or two and returned to the shelf; others require a lifetime to savor their richness. These latter volumes should be owned and cherished — to travel with, to sleep beside, the most satisfying of all companions.

New books or old books — what does it matter? If you have not read a book before it is to all intents and purposes new, whether it was printed yesterday or 300 years ago.

We are all children of a technological age, living in a time of bewildering flux. Printing is no longer the only way of reproducing books. Reading them, however, has not changed. It is the same as it has always been since Callimachus administered the great library in Alexandria.

There is a power in some books to evoke the time and the place of their first reading. Simply by looking at them or riffling through their pages we are magically transported to a moment of initial awakening or discovery. It is good to keep such books close at hand.

A. Edward Newton wrote: "Books are for me a solace and a joy. We are told that of the making of them there is no end. Be it so. Let us rejoice that, whatever comes, books will continue to be, books that suit our every mood and fancy. If all is vanity, as 'The Preacher' says, how can we better employ our time than by reading books and writing about them?"

Above all, when does one find time for books? One finds time by taking it.

The following brief selections about books should be of interest.

• Readers may be divided into four classes: Sponges, who absorb all they read and return it nearly in the same state, only a little dirtied. Sand-glasses, who return nothing and are content to get through a book for the sake of getting through the time. Strain-bags, who retain merely the dregs of what they read. Mogul diamonds, equally rare and valuable, who profit by what they read and enable others to profit by it also. (Samuel Taylor Coleridge)

• The Laws of Books. A man should not write any accounts upon the pages of a book or scribble anything on any part of it. If one wishes to take a nap, he must first cover his books up, and not recline upon them. If a book has fallen to the ground, and at the same time some money or a sumptuous garment has fallen also, he shall first pick up the book. If a fire breaks out in his house, he shall first rescue his books, and then his other property. Sefer Chassidon (Book of the Pious) Regensburg, Germany (1190).

• There are 39 books in the Hebrew scriptures, 929 chapters, 23,214 verses, 593,493 words. The longest book in the Hebrew scriptures is the Book of Psalms, the longest verse is verse 9 in Chapter 8 of the Book of Esther, a 90-word description of the Persian Empire. The word Jehovah occurs 6,855 times but the name of God is not mentioned in the Book of Esther.

• Bizarre Bibles include: The Fool Bible printed in the reign of Charles I reads in Psalm 14: "The fool hath said in his heart there is a God." For this mistake the printers were fine 3,000 pounds. The Wicked Bible — 1632 — the word not in the seventh commandment is omitted, making it read: "Thou shalt commit adultery." This error cost the printer his ears. The Bug Bible — 1535 — reads: "Thou shalt not nede to be afrayed for eny bugges [instead of terror] by night," in Psalm 91:5.

Marty, Avrum bring own brand of zaniness to cooking show

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Marty Galin (left) and Avrum Rosensweig bring a unique brand of zany humor to their cooking and food show. [Stephen Epstein photo]

TORONTO — Just before Chanukah, Avrum Rosensweig and Marty Galin appeared on CFTO TV's magazine show, Eye on Toronto, to give viewers some helpful hints on preparing their holiday turkey.

The two were going to demonstrate Galin's mother's tried and true recipe for stuffing and marinating a big bird.

And why not? In just a few short months, the two had made names for themselves as hosts of Talk 640's The Marty & Avrum Restaurant and Food Show; so clearly they had the credentials to speak authoritatively on the culinary arts.

Well, maybe. After their 10-minute stint on the show, viewers might have been led to re-evaluate whether "culinary" and "arts" should be mentioned in the same sentence with Marty and Avrum, as Galin frantically rammed stuffing into the unfortunate bird's exposed innards before dunking the turkey in Coca Cola and orange juice.

Cooking specialists? Not really. Charming, funny? Absolutely, as the two brought zaniness, good humor and high spirit to food preparation that serious cooking aficionados, or anyone from France, would find puzzling.

"Food is food. We don't take food seriously. It's fun," said Rosensweig as they replayed the videotape from that memorable TV appearance for The CJN.

Despite sharing the stage with a group of Elvis impersonators, Galin and Rosensweig stole the show with their hilarity and hijinks. They bring the same sort of humor to their weekly radio program.

Airing from 9 to 11 a.m. on Sunday mornings on AM 640, their show has been compared to TV's Furniture on the Mend, in which two longtime friends kibbitz as they varnish, or to Siskel and Ebert's movie reviews.

Add the Three Stooges or Lewis and Martin to the list, as fun, comedy and a lively atmosphere are the operative motifs for their program.

Of course, there are elements of seriousness in the radio show as well. The two have interviewed renowned chefs and restaurateurs, hosted theme shows, including one on Chanukah, and even gotten their guests to cook while on the air.

Since radio is notoriously poor for visuals, it's their job to be as descriptive as possible while the chefs are cooking, and to use the sizzling sautes as background sounds while on the air, they say.

People turning on their radios at 9 in the morning want to hear upbeat stuff, Rosensweig said.

"There's a lot of different things for different people," Galin said. "There are recipes, restaurant reviews, humor. Toronto used to be a meat and potatoes town. Now it's got more restaurants per capita than anywhere."

Guests on the show "really let down their guards. They come in nervous, but it's a warm, safe booth. We tell people, 'Just relax,' " he added.

"Cooking is somehow seen as highbrow or elitist," Rosensweig pipes in. "But it's not. You can have fun with it. You can bring it down to earth."

Seven months ago, Rosensweig and Galin had no idea they'd be hosting a cooking show. The two, who have been friends for 10 years, were writing a column in the magazine Hot Toronto when AM 640 called and asked them to be guests on a talk show. They agreed and what they expected would be a five-minute spot turned into a half-hour free-for-all, during which "we took over the show," Galin recalls.

Their timing couldn't have been better, as their appearance coincided with AM 640's decision to switch from rock music to an all-talk format. The day after their appearance, the station's programming director called and told them they'd generated a terrific response and would they be interested in a regular one-hour spot at noon on Fridays?

Rosensweig, who works as assistant campaign director for the United Jewish Appeal, and Galin, an out-of-work actor, jumped at the opportunity. They started in September and eventually were offered a plum spot on Sunday mornings.

Rosensweig, the son of an Orthodox rabbi, was "not brought up in an environment where going to restaurants was a way of life," though Galin remembers weekly outings to eat.

Galin worked as a waiter at the Organ Grinder restaurant, where his specialty was getting customers clapping and singing along to Hava Nagilah.

He later trained waiters in St. Louis and San Diego; so restaurant life is in his blood, if not his kishkes.

Aided by three students who provide research, logistic support and roving reports, the pair have hit on a formula for radio success — keeping things lively.

While they're basking in the success of their radio show, they're close to completing a pilot for a television program that they hope to sell. If successful, they might find yet a bigger audience for their unique brand of kitchen craziness.

Balanced budgets brought down in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Jewish Federation of Hamilton/Wentworth & Area concluded the year on a high note, outgoing president David Steinberg said at the recent annual general meeting at the JCC.

Thanks to sour economies and a reorganized budget and allocations system, the federation balanced its budget, Steinberg said, adding he is confident the Jewish community "will survive even in these difficult economic times and that we'll be stronger for it."

Steinberg also announced that Jewish Social Services (JSS) has recently become independent of the federation.

Forced by government cutbacks to move back to the JCC from its rented quarters last fall, JSS, he said, "is now a separate corporation with its own board," with former chair Jack Leon as president.

Like Steinberg, incoming president Greorge Czutrin is a Family Court judge.

The Hungarian-born son of survivors, Czutrin immigrated to the United States in 1956 with his family. He settled in Hamilton with his wife Lynne 20 years ago.

Speaking briefly on behalf of Midrasha, the community Jewish high school now in its second year, co-chair Dr. Judah Denburg noted that 40 students are enrolled in the Hebrew course; 28 in contemporary Jewish studies and 17 in Jewish texts and history.

"Next year," said Denburg, "we're planning to have two levels."

Reporting on other committees were treasurer William Halpren; United Jewish Appeal co-campaign chair Dr. Cheryl Klein Greenbaum; Ina Frank, chair, communmity planning; and federation executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel.

Past president Abe Szpirglas made the official presentation to Steinberg and installed the new board.

A year after being faced with a "shape up or else" ultimatum, Hamilton's JCC not only presented a balanced budget at its annual general meeting, but ended the year "slightly better than even."

"There's been tremendous improvement," said newly installed president Larry Szpirglas.

Under a "general operational framework" established in the fall of 1994 by a joint JCC and federation committee headed by federation president David Steinberg, the JCC was to operate under strict budget outlines, strive to increase membership and encourage greater use of the building by providing more and better Jewish and social programming.

As well, it was to try and obtain the zoning changes needed for the best possible use of its 34-acre property and press for an extension of the city bus route to the JCC.

"We've come a long way," Szpirglas said, "but we still have a significant way to go."

Membership has increased and better programming and the recent move by Jewish Social Services (JSS) to the JCC have led to greater use of its facilities, but more support is still needed.

Extension of the bus route has now been all but ruled out, but the transportation problem has been temporarily solved with the help of a regional transit system and car pick ups for those who need them.

Seniors and others using JSS and the kosher food bank are affected the most and the JCC is prepared to work out some arrangements with JSS, Szpirglas said.

The major remaining problem is zoning, largely as a result of neighbors' objections, which have so far prevented the JCC from obtaining the changes necessary for both full institutional use of its building and recreational use of its land.

Szpirglas said his objectives for the next year include an intensive drive to increase membership from its current 397 families to 450; greater emphasis on Jewish identity and Jewish content in programming; improving services; doing "a lot of independent fundraising;" and finally overcoming the zoning problems.

School board split on Remembrance Day symbols

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A request by members of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) and the Manitoba Islamic Association to have other religious symbols included along with the Christian ones, at future Remembrance Day services in schools, recently sparked heated debate at a school board meeting.

"We wanted to share our perspective with the Winnipeg [Division No. 1] school board members," says Evelyn Hecht, WJCC director of community relations. "Our message was delivered. While some of the trustees were listening and prepared to consider this issue with an open mind, others unfortunately were responding to what they read in the newspapers or the phone calls they received."

The issue was brought forward by a Jewish teacher in the public school system who was disturbed by the proliferation of crosses at Remembrance Day services. While the Jewish and Islamic representatives have been framing the issue in positive terms, urging the inclusion of other religious symbols, the media have chosen to interpret the matter as a rejection of crosses in the school.

"Some of the calls have been quite upsetting," Hecht reports. "Our focus is strictly on the children, who are vulnerable and impressionable. How they are taught will determine our country's future. This has nothing to do with veterans or how others observe Remembrance Day."

Anita Neville, a Jewish member of the Winnipeg No. 1 school board, described the mood at the meeting as "somewhat inflammatory," adding, "This was not a high point in the affairs of the school division."

She describes the board as divided on the matter. "My understanding of it was not that crosses should be removed, but that other symbols should be included," she says.

"I have heard stories from Jewish parents who have had their children come home after a Remembrance Day service and ask if any Jews died in the war."

According to Hecht, Toronto schools adopted an inclusive policy on Remembrance Day and eventually moved to a generic peace symbol.

Neville reports that other delegates have asked to be heard on the matter at the board's next public meeting in mid-February. She expects a decision to be made by the end of February.

EJC president visits Montreal

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jean Kahn, one of the most well-known and influential figures of the Jewish communal scene in Europe, recently visited Montreal.

Kahn is currently president of the European Jewish Congress (EJC) and of the Consistoire Israélite de France.

In recent months, Kahn was also appointed chair of the new consultative committee on racism and xenophobia established by the Council of Europe, the administrative body of the 15-member European Union (EU). The governments of all 15 countries have appointed official representatives to this committee.

"The principal mandate of this task force is to alert the countries of the European Summit to the disquieting upsurge of racism in the countries of Europe," Kahn told The CJN in an exclusive interview.

Jean Kahn

The fight against anti-Semitism and racism is also a priority on the agenda of the EJC, which represents 25 Jewish communities, Kahn said, adding that those most affected are the Jewish communities still in the republics and satelite countries of the former Soviet Union.

"Since the early '90s, we have been helping these isolated and helpless communities to rediscover their cultural and spiritual identity. We have also helped them combat the virulent anti-Semitism which is plaguing them," he said.

In 1993, an information seminar on the social damages that result from racism and anti-Semitism was organized at the Kremlin for about 100 Russian members of parliament by the EJC, with the close cooperation of the Council of Europe.

In 1994, a similar seminar was organized for Russian journalists, and a few months ago, the EJC organized a study seminar in Krakow, near the Auschwitz extermination camp, for history teachers from all parts of Europe.

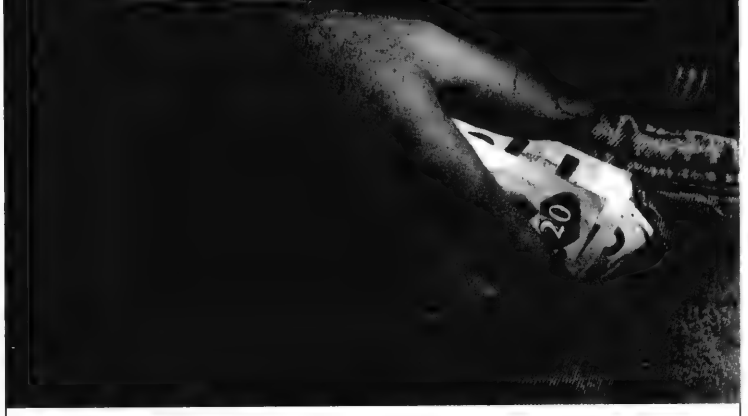
Put More Money In Your Pocket.



Borrowing Your RSP Contribution Can Actually SAVE You Money.

One of the few remaining ways Canadians can reduce the income tax they pay is by making contributions to an RSP. However, few of us have the cash required to make our maximum contribution.

By borrowing your maximum contribution, you can lower the amount of tax you pay now, and actually keep more of your hard earned money. Consider the following example.

John, age 30, has a maximum RSP contribution limit of $8,100. So far, he's only been able to save $2,100. Let's consider the benefits of John borrowing the additional $6,000 he needs to reach his limit.

Scenario #1

John decides not to borrow, leaving his total 1995 RSP contribution amount at $2,100. Assuming his combined federal and provincial tax rate is about 42%, his tax savings would be $882 (42% x $2,100). If his $2,100 RSP investment earns 10% per year over 25 years, it will grow to $23,000.

Scenario #2

John borrows the additional $6,000 to reach his goal of making his maximum contribution of $8,100. At his combined tax rate of 42%, his tax savings will be $3,402. If he receives this as a tax refund, he can reduce his loan immediately to $2,598.

$6,000	original amount borrowed
$3,402	less his tax refund amount applied to the loan
$2,598	new loan balance

John has also made a big difference in the value of his savings for his retirement years. By borrowing the $6,000 required to make his maximum contribution, John's $8,100 contribution, earning 10%, will have grown to $88,000 at age 55. That's $65,000 more than if he only contributed $2,100! That's the power of borrowing your maximum contribution.

We'll prepare an RSP loan for you in twenty minutes. Visit your local branch for more details.

Free trade will benefit both Canada, Israel

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel free trade agreement is probably the best thing that's happened between the two countries in years. Eventually it will be hailed as the historic agreement that it is.

The deal was announced Jan. 14 in Ottawa. It is subject to review by both governments and there are a few technical details about "specific provisions" that remain to be worked out, mainly in the area of agricultural products.

But behind the scenes, Canadian and Israeli officials are saying the deal is as good as done. Even technical issues can't stop the agreement now, they say.

The final signatures are expected some time in March, when Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres comes to Canada. The deal could go into effect as early as July 1.

Canada has been one of Israel's best friends for years, but the relationship was never cemented with very much hard cash.

Eli Yerushalmi, the chargé d'affaires at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, puts it more delicately. "For many years relations were friendly but had no substance."

That was a major problem. Canadians who didn't happen to be Jewish, Palestinian or Arab had less reason to care about what happened in Israel than if they had had money riding on the outcome.

The free trade agreement will help change all that. It will remove tariffs of 17 to 28 percent on most goods traded between the two countries. Those are incredible tariff burdens to doing business.

Canadian merchants trying to import Israeli jams, jellies, candy bars and even pretzels, were being hit by tariffs that completely wiped out their profits.

Israelis trying to export sophisticated electronic and technical equipment into Canada ran smack into the same tariff wall.

And Canadian furniture makers were getting beaten by Americans who have enjoyed a free trade agreement with Israel for several years.

It got so bad that at one point, Northern Telecom Ltd. began selling telecommunications equipment manufactured at its subsidiary in the south-eastern United States to take advantage of the tariff-free situation there.

Little wonder that Israeli-Canadian trade stagnated. Canada does five times as much business with Saudi Arabia as with Israel. Even Third World countries that Canada would hardly describe as "friends" rank ahead of Israel in trade with Canada. Sort of embarrassing way for two good friends to behave!

Every time an Israeli-Canadian free trade agreement was suggested, the answer came back: "Oh, but we do so little business with them." A sort of catch-22.

Meanwhile, the Americans continued to rake in the cash, their U.S.-Israel free trade agreement racking up proportionately five times the trade between Canada and Israel. With the kind of negative attitude that prevailed in Canada, it is a wonder the agreement ever came about.

Part of the credit for the new agreement has to go Dr. Henri Rothschild, director of the Canada-Israel Industries Research and Development Foundation, a kind of forerunner to the free trade agreement. It showed the way.

Part of the credit too has to go to far-sighted Canadian government officials who, right from the start, brought in Canadian Palestinian and Arab business people and showed them it was in their interest, too, that this agreement should go through. They preempted a political problem over the agreement.

That's because there's a clause in the agreement that everyone seems to have missed, everyone except Canadian Palestinians and Arabs, that is.

The new free trade deal will apply equally to the West Bank and Gaza because of the customs union negotiated recently between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

That means any Canadian Arab or Palestinian businessman doing business with Gaza or the West Bank (and there are plenty of them) will get the same benefits as anyone dealing with Israel. Little wonder the agreement presented no political problem for the Chrétien government.

This free trade deal with Israel would never have been possible without Israel's first having made peace with the Palestinians, and signing a customs union with the Palestinian Authority.

In time, the new free trade agreement may double and triple Canada-Israel trade, help increase political stability in the region and bring some measure of economic prosperity to the West Bank and Gaza. Who knows? It may even get some Canadians interested in the future and security of Israel who otherwise couldn't have cared less.

Wonderful, isn't it how a little economic self-interest can help make the world a better place to live?

MP addresses extremist group

TORONTO — Nova Scotia Liberal MP Roseanne Skoke, a vocal opponent of her own party's hate crimes legislation, last year addressed a meeting of a group connected to the ultra-right.

Skoke admits she addressed a meeting of the Canadian Association for Free Expression (CAFE), co-founded by Paul Fromm, who has long been involved with extremist organizations and has spoken at rallies of the racist Heritage Front.

Fromm was removed from his teaching job in Peel region after he was shown attending a party celebrating Adolf Hitler's birthday.

A photo of Skoke addressing the group was included on a CAFE newsletter and captioned: "MP Roseanne Skoke discusses Bill C-41 [the hate crimes law] at CAFE meeting in Toronto."

Skoke told The Globe and Mail: "I had no personal association with the group or any of the people at all."

She said she merely accepted an invitation for a speaking engagement, one of many on her schedule.

Canadian Jewish Congress accepts Skoke's explanation that she did not know about the organization's racist ties.

Canadians slam opponents, finish second in bridge

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Here's a test of your knowledge of a popular tabletop game.

Bridge is:
a. soon to be an Olympic event;
b. a way to make a living;
c. taught as a course in high schools;
d. a game of skill and nerves;
e. all of the above.

Ask Irving Litvack that question and he should have no trouble picking the correct answer.

As non-playing captain (coach) of the Canadian national bridge team and as a proprietor of the Regal-St. Clair Bridge Club, he would be able to tell from personal knowledge that a, b and d are all correct. Thanks to education programs in Holland and China, you can add c to the mix and come up with e as the correct answer.

Litvack will be demonstrating his extensive knowledge of the mind-bending game of bridge at Harbourfront on Jan. 27 from 7 to 11 p.m. during It's How You Play the Game, the cultural facility's annual look at tabletop games.

Contacted at his bridge club in Lawrence Plaza, Litvack pointed out that Canada in recent years has joined the world's elite when it comes to competitive bridge, winning a silver medal at the recent World Bridge Competition in Beijing, China.

Canada's mostly Jewish team exceeded expectations to get to the final round versus the powerhouse U.S. team. They succumbed to fatigue and frayed nerves before bowing out.

Canada's team consisted of Torontonians Fred Gitelman, George Mittelman and Litvack along with Montrealers Eric Kokish, Joseph Silver, Mark Molson and Boris Baran.

With Molson the only non-Jew on the team, Litvack is at a loss to explain why Jews make up 6/7 of the Canadian contingent. His only explanation? "Jews are always card players," he said.

Gitelman, who at age 30 is about 20 years younger than his teammates, agreed: "A lot of kids in Jewish families play cards while growing up. The earlier you play bridge, the better you get at it."

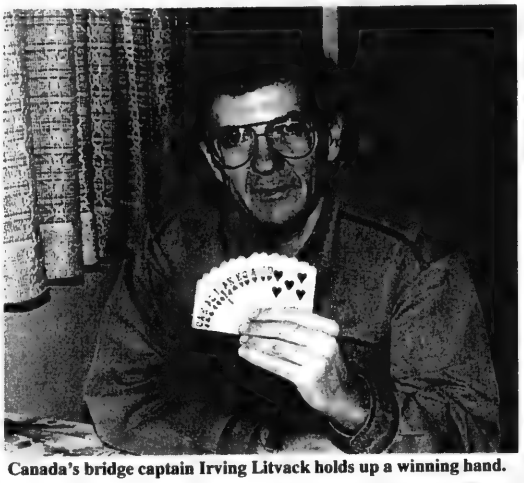
Prior to the tournament, the Canadians "were never picked to advance by the cognoscenti, but I always though we had a good chance," Litvack said.

Ironically, it was Canada's competence and good sportsmanship that allowed the United States to even qualify for the playoffs. With one match to go in the double round robin preliminaries, Canada sat in third place and a loss to Brazil would have allowed the Brazilians to qualify and eliminated the Americans.

Instead, Canada defeated the boys from Brazil and opened the door for the U.S. team.

"We wanted them in," Litvack said. "We wanted to beat them."

In the playoffs, Canada easily handled the inexperienced South Africans before being given a scare by the powerful Swedes.



Canada's bridge captain Irving Litvack holds up a winning hand.

Those wins brought them up against the Americans in the final round but by then "both teams had run out of gas" and both played poorly, Litvack said.

When all was said and done, the Canucks played bridge for 12 days straight with only two half-days off for rest.

"I think the emotional drain just got to us. We lost our mental sharpness" and that led to a host of mistakes, Litvack said.

One player even lost his cool. In the pressure-packed final, which was broadcast live on Chinese television, one Canadian was so unhappy with the play of his partner he got up and walked away from the table, Litvack said.

The final matchup involved playing 160 boards (hands) over two-and-a-half days. At one point, Canada was down by 77 points but in one 16-board set, reduced that margin by 51. After the last board, the United States won by about 40 points.

"They were ready to be beaten," Litvack said with some regret, though Canada's fine showing vaulted them into the world's bridge elite, he added.

Describing the formula for success for top players, Litvack said "you need a good application of logic, determination, good powers of concentration, team spirit and you never give up."

Bridge was recently made part of the Olympic movement and will be an experimental event in the games following the Atlanta Olympiad.

Litvack has tasted international competition before, teaming with Silver to represent Canada at the 1993 Maccabiah Games, winning a bronze medal. Gitelman teamed with Jeff Hampson and the pair finished fourth.

Litvack, Molson, Gitelman and Kokish all make a living from bridge. Molson and Gitelman play in international tournaments and Gitelman has developed a computer program to help players improve their games. Kokish is a bridge journalist and coach.

The other members of the team have kept their day jobs. Silver is a criminal lawyer in Montreal; Baran is a professor of computer science at Concordia University; Mittelman is a stockbroker.

Ottawa scientist wins prestigious Israeli award

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Morris Schnitzer, a semi-retired scientist from the Centre for Land and Biological Research at Agriculture Canada, has won the Wolf Award, recognizing his lifetime contribution to the field of soil chemistry.

Past recipients of the award from the Israel-based Wolf foundation include physicist Stephen Hawking and artist Marc Chagall.

Schnitzer, the first Jew to win in the agriculture category, will share the $100,000 (US) prize with Frank Stevenson of the University of Illinois. Israel President Ezer Weizman will present the award on March 24.

Schnitzer also recently became the first Canadian to win the Soil Science Distinguished Service Award from the 12,000-member Soil Science Society of America.

"He is a genius, one of the best scientists Canada has ever produced," says colleague S.U. Khan.

Schnitzer's agricultural career began during World War II. A native of Germany, he and his brother were able to join kindertransports leaving the country after Kristallnacht. Schnitzer went to Holland, his brother to England.

In Holland, Schnitzer joined Mizrachi and for two years worked on a training farm, in preparation for starting life in Israel. When the Nazis invaded Holland, he spent the rest of the war on the run, living underground in Belgium, Switzerland and France.

After the war he joined his brother, the only other family survivor, who had emigrated and was living in Montreal.

At 25, Schnitzer decided to go back to school and prepare for university. "It was like an explosion when I started. I was so hungry for knowledge."

The Wolf and Soil Science Society awards recognize Schnitzer's pioneering research into humic acids, which, among other functions, control nutrients and the movement of pesticides in soil.

Since his semi-retirement in 1991, Schnitzer maintains an office at Agriculture Canada and supervises graduate fellows.

Nizkor fights hate on Internet

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspodent

VICTORIA — The Nizkor Project, which both compiles and fights hate propaganda on the Internet, delivers up to 40,000 files per month, says director Ken McVay in a year-end report.

Nizkor (Hebrew for We will remember) joined the Internet in April 1995 and by the end of the year, the project had delivered 300,000 files.

"For the first time in the history of the Internet, educational material concerning the Holocaust is available freely and instantly," says McVay, who calls the collecton of material The Shofar PTP Archives.

McVay, who is not Jewish, operates Nizkor through a computer system on Vancouver Island. He started his project voluntarily and on his own about three years ago "to focus upon my determination to protect the memory of those who died at the hands of the Nazi regime."

He told The CJN at that time he was offended by Holocaust denial activities and resolved to fight back. He was using an old computer and transcribed printed text manually, causing painful aches to his wrists and elbows. Now, Project Nizkor has grown and has the use of two scanning systems.

Text that would have taken a month or more to transcribe can be scanned and added to the archives in a few days, according to the McVay report.

McVay, who worked as a grocery clerk and operated his computer project as a hobby, came to the attention of some Vancouver academics who helped him raise funds to organize the Nizkor Project. The project has the support of such organizations as Canadian Jewish Congress, the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights and Hadassah-WIZO and gets funding from the public through a campaign organized by Congregation Emanu-El of Victoria.

McVay, who now works full time on the project, has spoken and demonstrated the type of material he has compiled in many Canadian centres including Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Kingston, Ottawa, Montreal, Kitchener and Hamilton. He will be featured at an all-day forum on the Internet at a retreat of the national officers of Congress in the Empress Hotel in Victoria early in February.

In recent weeks, Nizkor has added to the archives such material as Skinhead International: A Worldwide Survey of neo-Nazi Skinheads; Research Report, The Church of the Creator: Creed of Hate; Ross Casey Interview in Australia with David Irving; "and hundreds of pages documenting activities of organized hate groups worldwide."

Plans for 1996 include translation of some of the documents into French and German for non-English users. He will begin scanning the entire Nuremberg trials documents to add them to the archives, a process which will take about two years.

For additional information, contact Rick Kool, evenings only. Monday through Thursday, at 604-386-9326 in Victoria.

Montreal female rabbi overcomes barriers

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Becoming Montreal's first female rabbi causes Barbara Borts no unease.

She was among the first three women ordained by the Reform movement in England, and had to overcome barriers and outright prejudice not only from the more traditional Jewish establishment, but also within the movement's own congregations.

Borts, 41, a native of Santa Clara, Calif., who was ordained at London's Leo Baeck College in 1981, is the new associate rabbi at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom.

Her primary responsibility at the 900-member congregation will be leading the religious school and adult education, giving a sermon about once a month and otherwise complementing the work of Rabbi Leigh Lerner.

"It was difficult to get a job," she said of her early years in Britain. "Our own congregations would openly not hire women, and Reform rabbis generally could not work as chaplains at Hillel, for example."

Today, there are about 375 women Reform rabbis worldwide. Subtle bias against women in the pulpit probably lingers, but Rabbi Borts shrugs it off.

Nor is she concerned about how she will be received by the overwhelming Orthodox rabbinate of Montreal. She hopes for positive contact, but, if not, "It'll be their loss. I'm not looking to them to legitimize me. Certainly, I don't lack ways of getting involved in the community."

Rabbi Borts describes her approach to Judaism as putting fairly equal weight on the spiritual, the intellectual and social action. In the past, she has been particularly concerned with issues related to the environment, women, interfaith dialogue and disarmament.

She hopes to encourage textual study of Jewish sources and stimulate discussion on Judaism's relevance in the contemporary world.

She is committed to contributing to the development of "gender-sensitive" liturgy at the temple. The language of worship, Rabbi Borts believes, should be as inclusive of women as the ritual now is.

David Rome was a prominent Jewish historian

MONTREAL — Prominent historian and author David Rome, whose professional career at Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) spanned more than 60 years, died last week. He was 85.

"Over the last few years as the historian for the CJC National Archives, Mr. Rome continued to instruct and absorb the experience of our history as a changing society," said CJC president Goldie Hershon. "We greatly mourn his passing."

Born in Lithuania in 1910, Rome was an observer of the Canadian Jewish experience from the time of his arrival in Vancouver (via Halifax) in 1921. He studied English literature at the University of British Columbia and the University of Washington in Seattle, and held degrees in library science and English literature from McGill University and the Université de Montréal.

Before coming to CJC as the organization's first press officer in 1942, Rome was the English editor of the Toronto Hebrew Journal, as well as the first national director of the Labor Zionist organization.

During his early years at CJC, he worked with many of the people who shaped the Canadian Jewish community, including Samuel Bronfman, Saul Hayes, H. M. Caiserman and Louis Rosenberg.

David Rome

He was the director of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal before returning to CJC as archivist in 1972.

From his earliest days in Montreal, Rome showed a deep concern for creating a dialogue and spirit of shared heritage between Jews and Quebecers. In 1942, he served as secretary to the CJC committee of Jewish-French Canadian relations, and in the early 1950s, he founded the Cercle Juif de la langue Française, the first francophone Jewish cultural group in Canada.

Rome served on the Council of Arts for the Government of Quebec and the Comité Judéo Catholique, established by Archbishop Paul Gregoire in 1971. He co-authored the book Juifs et Québécois français: 200 ans d'histoire commune and was one of the founders of the Institut Québécois de recherche sur la culture juive.

In recognition of his ceaseless efforts along these lines, he was named Knight of the Order of Quebec in 1987. Concordia University bestowed upon him an honorary doctor of laws degree in 1991.

In 1994, Montreal-based Jewish refugees honored him for the role he played in their rescue by CJC from Spain and Portugal, where they had fled 50 years earlier.

Last May, the Canadian Jewish Historical Society organized a tribute evening for him.

A prolific historian and a devoted bibliographer of Jewish Canadiana, his first historial book was published in 1942 by H. M. Caiserman. He went on to publish more than 60 volumes.

Despite failing health in recent years, he continued to write. Recent publications include Les Pierres Qui Parlent/The Stones That Speak with Jacques Langlais, a photographic history of the Jewish community of Quebec, and the English translation of the French history book Jews and French Quebecers: Two Hundred Years of Shared History, which he co-authored with Langlais.

Rome is survived by his wife Molly, his daughter Tibie and three grandchildren.

MS Society honors Rabbi Moshe Stern

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last November, at its annual meeting, the Manitoba Division of the Multiple Sclerosis (MS) Society of Canada recognized Rabbi Moshe Stern for his efforts on behalf of Manitobans with the disease.

Earlier in the year, the Manitoba Division nominated Rabbi Stern for the national organization's President's Award.

"I was particularly touched that I was nominated by the people I consider my friends and colleagues in suffering," said Rabbi Stern, who is Orthodox.'

He has been a professor at the University of Manitoba for 26 years and is currently teaching in the Department of Religion. He was diagnosed with MS in 1980.

Rabbi Stern and his wife, Sydell (who received an award last spring from the Manitoba Division of the MS Society), helped form the Living With MS support group for Manitobans with MS and their families. He has also been a society board member.

Multiple Sclerosis is a chronic disease that eventually destroys the nervous system. Rabbi Stern, however, has not let his illness keep him from maintaining an active life of community involvement. By using a wheelchair and Handi-Transit, he continues to teach at the university and participate in the community.

He is a member of the university senate and senate executive, and is involved in the Society for Manitobans with Disablities and the Canadian Paraplegic Association.

Canadians monitor 'dress rehearsal for democracy'

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Monitoring an election in a refugee camp was a first for the 11 Canadian members of the international observer team that oversaw Saturday's vote for the Palestinian council and presidency.

"It was a terrible contrast with Canada," said Roger Gallaway, MP for Sarnia, who was assigned to the Dir Balach refugee camp in the Gaza Strip.

"In some polling stations, the lighting was barely adequate because of the shortage of electricity," noted University of Montreal professor Baghat Korany, a political scientist who was also assigned to the Dir Balach camp.

But the less-than-ideal conditions did not dampen Palestinian enthusiasm for the election. In the Gaza Strip, where the Hamas had called for an election boycott, 85 percent of eligible voters cast their ballots.

"The turnout was tremendous — nearly 100 percent in one polling station," said Gallaway. "There were many old, sick people who had to be carried in to vote. The expression on their faces said everything. They were beaming with happiness and pride."

"There was a festive atmosphere. People felt they had something to celebrate," said Korany.

"Crowds gathered outside the courtyard and waited until 3:30 in the morning for the votes to be counted. It was unlike anything I had ever experienced in Canada," said Michael Lynk, an Ottawa-based lawyer, who was assigned to Gaza's Khan Yunis refugee camp.

The sheer enthusaism of the crowd, the poor conditions in the camps and the fact that these were the first elections for the Palestinians all combined to create a host of logistic problems.

"There was a crush of voters that was difficult to deal with," said Lynk. "It demonstrated just how badly people wanted these elections."

"Everyone showed up at the same time and they weren't used to queuing up," said MP Ovid Jackson, who was also posted at Khan Yunis. "We needed extra help to deal with the crowd. At one station, the ballot box filled up early on. We had to improvise with a plastic bag."

The size of the ballot presented another problem. "There were 66 candidates for eight seats," noted Lynk. "It's not easy to go through such a long list, especially for first-time voters. add to that the fact that some 15 percent of the voters were illiterate and needed help to fill out the ballot."

For all the logistic problems, Canadian observers — like the rest of the international monitoring team — say they witnessed no major irregularities in the voting or tallying. During the campaign, however, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat was sharply criticized by international observers for restricting the opposition and intimidating the press.

"Obviously there are grounds for improvement," said Lynk, who has been a human rights observer in the territories. "This is the first election for a society in transition."

"It's a beginning. In the next election there will probably be a more buoyant opposition," predicted Gallaway. "This was a dress rehearsal for democracy."

Arafat urged to amend covenant

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – Two of Yasser Arafat's loudest critics in the U.S. Congress traveled to Gaza earlier this month to evoke a renewed pledge from the Palestinian leader to remove language from the Palestine Liberation Organization Covenant, which calls for the destruction of Israel.

"Arafat said eyeball-to-eyeball that it would be out within two months of the [Palestinian] elections," Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said in a telephone interview last week.

Specter and Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) stopped off to meet with Arafat, and separately with Prime Minister Shimon Peres and other senior Israeli officials during a recent eight-day junket to Africa and Israel.

An inveterate critic of the Palestinian leader, Specter, who is Jewish, stressed the importance of using such meetings to keep pressure on Arafat to do his part to combat terrorism.

Specter and Shelby are the co-authors of legislation that ties U.S. aid to the Palestinian Authority to its compliance with the accords Arafat has signed.

Under the measure, which is a provision of legislation known as the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act, Arafat would forfeit U.S. aid until the covenant is changed.

Arafat promised to amend the covenant within 60 days of the Palestinian election.

"I'm skeptical, but now we'll see if he'll produce," Specter said of Arafat's pledge to alter the covenant. "We've got a specific promise with a specific date."

While many in Congress continue to focus on amending the covenant, Palestinian officials in Gaza and the West Bank have hinted in recent weeks that it could prove easier to win approval of an entirely new covenant.

Specter and Shelby – the only senators believed to have traveled overseas during the U.S. government shutdown – drew substantial criticism upon their return.

The senators apparently deemed the trip essential because Specter chairs the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and Shelby serves as a committee member. In the interview, Specter defended the trip as "time-sensitive," particularly in light of the upcoming Palestinian elections.

But, he added, with "20-20 hindsight, it would have been preferable to defer it, in the face of the media criticism."

Terror toll decreases

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – There was a dramatic decrease in the number of Israelis killed in terror attacks in the last quarter of 1995, according to a report released recently by Peace Watch.

According to the organization, one Israeli police officer Muhmad Chuvari, who was fatally shot in Kalkilya, was killed in the last three months of 1995, compared to 13 in the previous quarter.

According to Peace Watch, 49 Israelis were killed in 1995, with most of those recorded in the first three months of the year. By comparison, 73 Israelis were killed in 1994, 65 in 1993, 40 in 1992 and 22 in 1991.

Vote endorses peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

As expected, Yasser Arafat and his slate of hand-picked Fatah candidates swept to a landslide victory in last week's Palestinian elections in the West Bank, East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Most of all, Arafat's triumph was an endorsement of his leadership and of the Oslo peace process.

Arafat, head of the Palestine National Authority (PNA), is now president of an interim 88-seat self-governing council with limited powers.

The mandate of the council is to run the day-to-day affairs of the Palestinians in the autonomous areas relinquished by Israel, to build a Palestinian entity and, implicitly, to lay the groundwork for final status talks with Israel scheduled to begin in May.

The elections were marred by accusations of irregularities and gerrymandering and diminished by the decision of Islamic fundamentalists and left-wing secular nationalists to boycott the race. One must wonder whether the results would have been different had anti-Oslo organizations like Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine participated.

Nevertheless, the elections, an idea long in the making, were a significant moment in Palestinian affairs.

For the first time, the Palestinians have elected their own legislative body. As a result, they have attained an unprecedented measure of autonomy and have embarked on the road to statehood (with East Jerusalem as the capital), a remote possibility just a few years ago.

An embryonic Palestinian state already exists, given the fact that the PNA exercises jurisdiction over about one-third of the West Bank and more than half of the Gaza Strip.

In Zone A of the West Bank, the towns of Jericho, Nablus, Ramallah, Bethlehem, Jenin, Tulkarm and Qalqilya have fallen under Palestinian suzerainty. In March, the PNA will take over much of Hebron.

In Zone B, where Israel has overall responsibility for security, the PNA holds sway over more than 400 villages. The majority of the Palestinians of the West Bank live in Zones A and B.

Israel is fully in charge of Zone C, with its unpopulated state lands, Jewish settlements and Israeli military bases. But Zone C will also be on the negotiating table.

In the Gaza Strip, currently the seat of the PNA, the Palestinian flag flies over lands which are not occupied by Jewish settlements.

Once final status negotiations are launched, the fate of the rest of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as East Jerusalem, will hang in the balance.

The Palestinians will push for a complete Israeli withdrawal, but Israel will likely resist this maximalist demand.

This will be a bitter pill for the Palestinians to swallow. But if there is a continued decline in Arab terrorism, and if Arafat keeps his promise and amends the Palestinian national covenant in March, Israel may be more flexible with respect to territorial issues.

Initially, the PNA was unable or unwilling to control terrorism. In 1994, the first full year of the Oslo process, 73 Israelis were killed in terrorist incidents, hardening Israeli opinion against it. By comparison, the figure dropped to 49 in 1995.

The PNA, in cooperation with Israel, has cracked down on terrorism because Arafat finally realizes that the attainment of Palestinian self-rule is dependent on his ability to deal with that phenomenon effectively.

According to an assessment presented by the Mossad to the cabinet recently, the decline in terrorist incidents is expected to continue as the PNA improves its operational abilities and forges closer security ties with Israel.

The amendment of the covenant is also high on Israel's agenda. Israel hopes that the newly elected representatives of the self-governing legislature who join the Palestine National Council — the PLO's parliament-in-exile — will wield a decisive influence in purging the clauses calling for Israel's destruction.

Arafat, in the 1993 Declaration of Principles, pledged to eliminate these articles, but has not done so because of opposition from within the Palestine National Council.

Arafat is under immense pressure to make good on his promise. Prime Minister Shimon Peres has warned him that the peace process will be at risk, while two influential U.S. senators — Arlen Specter and Richard Shelby — have told him that he will forfeit American aid, unless the covenant is amended within two months of last week's Palestinian election.

MP Finestone discusses women's rights in Israel

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — "The death of Yitzhak Rabin, like that of other outstanding leaders throughout history, was the result of the vitriolic language used by senior political figures," said Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women Sheila Finestone during a visit to Israel last week.

Finestone, who accompanied Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to the Rabin funeral in November, told The CJN that she does not blame any particular person or party for Rabin's death, but added: "In the public domain you have to watch your language. Stirring up ethnic and nationalistic tension through intemperate remarks can ultimately lead to the sacrifice of life."

During her week-long visit, Finestone met with Israeli government officials, as well as Palestinian and Israeli women's groups. She was also an official observer of the Palestinian elections and a guest speaker at WIZO's 75th anniversary celebrations.

Finestone said a high-level Palestinian women's delegation, which included two candidates who ran in Saturday's elections, had asked to meet with her to discuss the entrenchment of women's rights in the new Palestinian constitution.

In her meetings with Israeli women's groups, Finestone discussed ways of implementing the "platform for action" adopted at last year's international women's conference in Beijing, including a resolution calling for women's right to a violent-free society.

"Violence in the family, including rape and murder, is exactly the same problem in Jewish families as it is in the rest of society," she said. "There are men who don't believe that anyone from a Jewish family in Canada could beat or murder his wife. There are men who don't believe it is happening in Israel society either. But the women know that it is."

The fact that the problem has surfaced in Israel "means that Israel is no different than the rest of the world," she said. "One way to reduce such violence is to ensure the economic autonomy of women."

Finestone said Israeli women's groups had taken special interest in Canada's strides in pay equity, integration of women into the armed forces and civil divorce legislation.

She praised Israel's advances in education and immigration. "Israel is staking its future on its intellectual resources. Canada has much to learn from the way Israel promotes computer literacy," she said, noting that one in 11 Israeli children has a computer.

Sheila Finestone

"Israel has demonstrated the incredible impact that immigrants have had on the growth of the country," she said. "In much of the world, right-wing movements oppose immigration because they don't realize the role immigrants play in boosting economic growth. Canada is also in a position to demonstrate that immigrants are a positive factor in our life."

Finestone noted that Canada and Israel are among the 11 nations involved in a study to examine the integration of immigrants in urban areas. The two countries may also embark on joint understandings in women's health.

During her visit, Finestone met with Israeli Minister of Immigration and Absorption Yair Tzaban, Labor and Social Welfare Minister Ora Namir and Health Minister Ephraim Sneh.

Academics discuss identity issues

TEL AVIV — "It is time for Israel to give something back to Diaspora Jews by helping them fight their battle for survival," said Rabbi Yehuda Amital, minister without portfolio, at a conference last week.

Rabbi Amital rejected the traditional Israeli approach of urging Jews to immigrate to Israel. "The answer is not aliyah as many Israeli continue to believe. It is important to nurture strong Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora," said the minister, who was recently appointed head of a steering committee on Israel-Diaspora relations.

Rabbi Amital was speaking at an international workshop on Jewish identity held at Tel Aviv University's Rabbi Joseph H. Kelman Centre for Jewish Education. The centre was established in 1991 by Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda congregation and by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

Rabbi Amital, the 70-year-old head of a yeshivah in Kfar Etzion, said he was surprised by the warm response of secular Israelis to his ministerial appointment last month. "It showed how much the general public is searching for a Jewish voice with which it can identify."

He said he would use his post to strive towards three goals: deepening Jewish identity, bridging gaps between diverse sectors of Israeli society and improving ties between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

Asked about his views on Reform and Conservative Judaism — which are not recognized by Israel's Orthodox religious establishment — Rabbi Amital said he supported these movements because they were bringing more Jews back to the fold of Judaism.

"There is only one important question for me and that is 'Who is concerned with the continuity of Judaism?' Once there was fear that Conservatives drew Jews from Orthodox circles. Now the opposite is true: Conservative draw members from the secular public."

Rabbi Amital was one of a dozen speakers at the workshop, which was described by Rabbi Joseph Kelman as "an attempt by leading educators, sociologists and other academics to wrestle with questions of Jewish identity and identification."

"We realize that the traditional institutions of Judaism are not enough. We need a new agenda in both Israel and the Diaspora," said co-chair Dr. David Schers of Tel Aviv University's School of Education. "In Israel, it is clear that citizenship is not enough. Israelis must also be members of the Jewish people. And in the Diaspora, religious ritual is not enough."

He added that many Diaspora Jews discouraged intermarriage for the wrong reasons. "If you don't learn about Judaism and develop a positive Jewish identity, then the emphasis on associating with other Jews becomes empty, exclusive, segregating and even racist."

Weizman urges Germans to forge a better future

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

BONN – Appearing before the German parliament last week, President Ezer Weizman said he is unable to offer forgiveness in the name of the millions murdered by the Nazis, but he called upon the Germans to make an effort to build a better future.

His lyric speech, which spanned 4,000 years of Jewish history, lingered on the Holocaust, but went beyond it to dwell on the resurrection of Israel and the prospects of Middle East peace.

German parliamentarians and journalists praised the 20-minute speech for its sensitivity and sweep. To some Israeli listeners, it was among the most eloquent delivered by an Israeli leader since the days when Abba Eban was foreign minister.

The speech was delivered in the Bundestag, with members of the upper house, the Bundesrat, also attending. It was only the third time that a foreign dignitary has addressed the German parliament. The previous two speakers were former U.S. president Ronald Reagan and the late French president Francois Mitterrand. Weizman spoke in Hebrew and his remarks were simultaneously translated into German.

"It was not easy for me to visit Sachsenhausen," he said. "It was not easy to pass through this country and hear the voices calling from the earth. It is not easy for me to stand here and speak to you, my friends, in this hall."

Weizman noted that Jews had lived in Germany for 1,000 years, before the community was destroyed by the Nazis. Referring to the million Jewish children murdered, Weizman asked: "How many books died with them? How many unwritten symphonies died in their throats? How many scientific discoveries remained unshaped in their brains? Every one of them died twice -- once as a child taken by the Nazis to the camps, and once as the adult who could have been."

Nazism, he said, had stolen its victims not only from their families and their people, but from mankind.

"I cannot forgive in their name. I can only demand of you, members of the Bundestag and Bundesrat, knowing the past, to think also of the future, to discern every manifestation of racism, suppress every display of neo-Nazism, and uproot such phenomena before they grow.

"We meet here as representatives of sovereign states, and it is incumbent upon us to find that which unites us so that we can reach those goals we have set for ourselves."

Weizman began his speech by presenting himself as "the wandering Jew." "Two hundred generations have passed since Abraham left his birthplace and went to the land that is today my land. Only 150 generations passed between the pillars of fire of the Exodus from Egypt and the columns of smoke of the Holocaust.

"And I, born of the seed of Abraham and in his land, have been part of them all. I was a slave in Egypt, received the Torah on Mount Sinai and crossed the Jordan with Joshua. I entered Jerusalem with David, was exiled from it with Zedekiah, and remembered it by the waters of Babylon. I was burned at the stake in Mainz, studied Torah in Yemen, lost my family in Kishinev, was burned in Treblinka, participated in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, and emigrated to Israel, the land from which I was exiled and where I was born and from which I came and to which I return."

Theo Moench-Tegeder, of the weekly Rheinische Merkur, said he found the speech exceptional in its imagery and heritage-rich content. "This is the stuff from which you build a nation," he said. "I wish we had this historical sense in Germany. Apart from the extremist fringe, there is not a strong sense of national identity in Germany. Since the war, we are afraid to deal with our history."

Israeli PMO denies report of draft pact with Syria

Jerusalem Post Foregin Service

JERUSALEM – Media reports that the United States has drawn up a draft memorandum of understanding between Syria and Israel are baseless, the Prime Minister's Office said last week.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres referred to the issue, at a joint press conference with U.S. vice-president Al Gore, when he said that "it is more logical first to reach agreement and then to put the details on paper, than to write down things only to find there is no agreement."

The reaction came after local papers published quotes from the London-based Arabic-language newspaper A-Shark al-Aawsat.

According to the reports, the "draft memorandum" foresees a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights within eight months and the dismantling of settlements within six months after the signing of a treaty.

The paper claimed the draft was based on 12 points. Israel and Syria would grant each other diplomatic recognition, the paper said, and both sides would work toward normalization and joint economic projects would be set up.

As for security arrangements, the report said that U.S. troops would man the border while a symbolic international force would be stationed on the Syrian side of the border for the first two years. Early warning stations on the Golan would be manned by the Americans, the report said.

Meanwhile, both Israeli and U.S. officials are continuing to promote the possibility of a peace agreement before the upcoming elections.

Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir told EU ambassadors that "considerable understanding" has been reached with the Syrians concerning the quality of peace.

"Although Syria's positions are not entirely clear to us, we know for a fact that Syria is interested in signing a peace treaty with Israel in 1996," he said. "In the upcoming round of talks, we will focus on the security arrangements and water issues."

Proper security guarantees

Speaking at Tel Aviv University last week, Minister Yossi Beilin, stressed that the next round of talks with Syria will determine whether a peace treaty can be achieved this year. The United States cannot compensate Israel for an inadequate accord with Damascus.

Beilin said that although U.S. involvement is necessary for an Israeli-Syrian peace treaty, Washington cannot replace the need for proper security guarantees.

"There is room to think that the United States will try to compensate both sides for what has not been achieved in the negotiations," Beilin said. "But there is a limit. I don't see where a defence treaty [between Israel and the United States] can replace borders."

Beilin said the next round of talks, which begin next week, followed by another visit by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, will determine whether Israel and Syria can reach an agreement this year. He urged the United States to press Syria to show flexibility in helping close the gaps on outstanding substantive issues with Israel, including border disputes, water, security arrangements and normalization.

"The moment of truth is not between America and Israel," Beilin said. "It's when Syria and Israel look each other in the eye and say we have to arrive at real peace."

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Ehud Barak said that if necessary, the IDF can beat the Syrian army on the battlefield, and could beat another army as well, should one decide to join the Syrians in the fighting.

Speaking to a group of 11th and 12th graders at Blich High School in Ramat Gan, Barak said the talks "are not yet full negotiations, but are a very important sounding-out process."

Passion for education needed

Sadie and Gertie, two elderly Jewish ladies, meet on a Miami Beach street. Sadie asks Gertie how old her grandchildren are.

Responds the proud grandmother, "The doctor is four and the lawyer is three."

While this may be an extreme example, it is typical of the passion for education that infuses Jewish culture.

Not for us the notion that going to school is for sissies. Education is recognized not only as a way to better oneself in a world that often does not welcome us, but as a valuable goal in itself.

That is why Jewish communities around the world spend so much time, money and effort establishing and maintaining the best educational facilities possible.

Toronto has a record of which it can be proud. We have day schools, both elementary and secondary, that serve the population from the secular to the Orthodox. Supplementary schools abound, offering a variety of quality programs. We even have two schools for students with special needs: She'arim for the learning disabled and Zareinu for the mentally or physically handicapped.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and United Jewish Appeal recognize their responsibility in this field and allot the largest percentage of their funds to education.

But the picture is not unilaterally rosy.

The recession that has battered the community as a whole has not left schools untouched. Many are struggling to pay off debts incurred during better times, and to provide the services and programs that parents demand, despite constantly shrinking amounts of money.

The temptation is to deal with monetary crises in a simplistic manner. It is easy to cut remedial classes for weaker students, to embarrass parents applying for tuition subsides into paying more than they can afford, to save staff salaries by stuffing children into larger and larger classes.

These are all dangerous tacks to take. We have a responsibility to provide a quality education for all students, no matter that they may be truly disabled or just not as sharp or talented as some others. A civilization is judged, not by how well its strongest members make out, but by how compassionately it deals with the weakest.

On the other hand, a civilization that ignores its most talented members, and assumes that they will manage whatever is or is not done for them, risks turning itself into a tragic, empty mediocrity.

A class that is too large drains the enthusiasm and talents of the best teacher and leaves the students floundering and insecure, feeling they are part of a mass, rather than individuals of signficance.

When we harass, insult or demean those who are struggling financially, not only are we breaking the rule of conduct that says embarassing another is the same as killing them, but we are creating a whole group of disenchanted, sullen and bitter people, who, instead of supporting and encouraging the institution and its goals, will sit back and watch it discombobulate itself.

That being said, parents have the obligation to recognize that giving their children a Jewish education is an obligation to the continuity not only of their family, but of the Jewish people as a whole.

We must all — fundraisers, schools, parents and communal officials — boldly, responsibly and sensitively accept the challenges that we face. The price we will pay if we don't is nothing less than our future. L.S.

A student's thoughts

Sometimes both teachers and parents forget that the ultimate beneficiary of our education system is the student. This musing from a young woman attending a Toronto Hebrew secondary school may remind us of just how intimidating the process can be from their point of view.

You are sitting still at your desk. You can't move. Your cheeks are burning, and the lump in your throat is disrupting your breathing.

The teacher stands in front, and the class is all staring at you waiting for an answer.

Your hands begin to sweat as you desperately repeat the question in your head, trying to come up with at least a semi-correct answer.

Finally, a light bulb goes on in your head, and you think you know — but you're not sure.

You mumble something under your breath, but the teacher can't hear you. You are still too dubious about your answer to repeat it louder.

All eyes in the class are on you. Hot tears begin to accumulate in your eyes, and your heart is beating so hard that you wonder if others can hear it. Your chest feels as if it's about to burst.

RRRing. What? What's that you hear? Is that a bell? Suddenly you get a feeling in your body that is similar to the feeling when nausea passes. Your beating heart slows down, you feel a slight chill, which feels pleasant, as the sweat leaves your face and hands.

You take a deep breath. You are free.

Beth Jacob students reach out to Russian immigrants

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The girls of Beth Jacob High School are not content to work on their own commitment to Jewish practice and Jewish continuity — they want to spread their faith to others, especially those who have not been exposed to it.

For three years, a once a week program called Ashreinu has taught Russian immigrant elementary-school aged girls about Jewish customs, philosophy and spirit, liberally laced with games, arts and crafts, trips and sports.

During the summer, Ashreinu runs a day camp, which has proved very popular.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has recognized the importance and success of Ashreinu, and recently awarded it a grant from its continuity funds.

This year, a new program has been added for girls 12 to 15. Called Shalsheles Sarah, it is dedicated to the late Rebbetzen Shirley Steinberg, widow of community chaplain Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg.

Chana Steinberg, their daughter, is heavily involved in Shalsheles Sarah. She told The CJN that she thought it was an appropriate way to remember her mother, who "taught Russian children and was very involved with the Russian community."

The goal of the program, she said, is "to show them that Yiddishkeit is fun. We want to give them the treasure we have."

Chavi Hendler and Huvie Klein, 16-year-old Grade 11 students who chair Shalsheles Sarah, added simply that "we want to plant a seed [of Yiddishkeit]."

A big and little sister program lets the Russian girls "feel that someone is there for them, if they want someone to talk to," said Hendler.

Last month, about 15 Shalsheles girls and nearly 60 Ashreinu girls came together for a Chanukah Shabbaton. Some of their parents joined them for part of the program.

"You should have seen their faces shining," enthused Steinberg, describing the singing, dancing, inspiring speeches and general fun atmosphere.

Klein noted that the event was very moving for the parents, many of whom had never observed Chanukah themselves.

"It brought back memories of their parents [lighting the menorah]," she said.

Beth Jacob contributed funds for the Shabbaton, but the girls received donations from caterers, bakeries, and stores.

"We were given all kinds of food, latkes, salads, cookies and as many menorahs as we wanted," Steinberg said.

"It shows how the community cares," said Klein.

Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, principal of Beth Jacob, fully supports Ashreinu and Shalsheles Sarah. "Everyone enjoyed the environment, and it introduced parents to a sense of Jewish consciousness."

The students of Beth Jacob have an active chesed program beyond these two projects, including visiting the sick, elderly and shut-ins; helping mothers with small children, taking a lulav and etrog to nursing homes and homes for the aged on Sukkot, and distributing shalach mones on Purim.

Student subsidies tell two stories

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

The percentage of students in Toronto's Jewish day school system who receive financial assistance is down for the fourth year in a row.

But the actual number of students who get subsidies is up, says Bernard Shoub, director of school finances for the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

The figures tell two stories. In the academic year 1995-96, 41.4 per cent of BJE-funded day school pupils — or just over 2,800 kids — are receiving some form of financial assistance, ranging from full subsidies to fees which are topped up by a few hundred dollars.

Last year, the percentage was 41.9 of students in 13 BJE day schools. In the two years previous, the ratios were 42.3 per cent and 43 per cent, respectively.

So it would seem that fewer Jewish families need help.

But, Shoub points out, enrolment has increased over the last four years, meaning that the number of subsidized students in that time has actually gone up by over 100.

"The key issue is that even though the percentage of subsidies is down, we're working with more students," Shoub says.

Averaged out, between one-third and two-fifths of tuition fees are covered by subsidies, a barometer that has not changed, he notes.

There are some Jewish welfare families whose fees are completely covered. Those subsidies come from United Jewish Appeal dollars, Shoub points out.

And they are determined by a family's ability to pay, not its willingness to pay, Shoub says.

"The philosophy at some schools is that no one is turned away. But it's on a first come, first served basis and only if family cannot pay [full fees]."

As an optimist, Shoub prefers to see the glass half-full. "The amazing thing is that 58 per cent [of families] pay full fees, and the bottom line at many schools is that tuition accounts for 85 to 90 per cent of their income."

But Shoub recognizes that the economy plays a role only up to a point. After that, "you can be making a good living, but when you have three children in the system, you can have problems."

That's why, he added, he's looking forward to a positive judgment from the Supreme Court of Canada. The court begins hearing arguments on the public funding of private and independent Ontario schools this week.

CJN student panel discovers bond despite differences

In 1992, we took a first look at four youngsters from a variety of Jewish backgrounds to kick off an annual series examining their changing perceptions. This year, we introduce a fifth student, to reflect a perspective shaped by a co-educational Jewish high school experience.

When we began, the original group of four was caught up in the excitement of their bar/bat mitzvah year. The series will continue to follow their journey to adulthood through the year 2000.

After reading about each other for the past few years, the four high school students who have been profiled in the Education Supplement since 1992 have finally had a chance to meet.

Eitz Chaim alumnus Chaim Greenwald, a Grade 12 student at the Wisconson Institute of Torah Study in Milwaukee, was in town during Sukkot, and he joined Ali Bresver and Naomi Emerson, both 16 and in Grade 11, for a joint interview in the cafeteria of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC).

The fourth student, Jacob Korenblum, was unable to attend, but joined the two girls, along with — for the first time — a fifth teenager, Nathan Wise, a Grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto — at The CJN office in December.

Ali, a student at Temple Emanu-El's supplementary school and the only one of the group who has never attended a Jewish day school, admitted that she hadn't been looking forward to the interview at the BJC.

"I didn't want to come here and feel not as educated, but I found it really interesting. We do have differences in opinion, but I'm really glad we got to meet. We found out we don't not like each other. We're all nice people; we just have different backgrounds when it comes to Judaism."

Ali's comments followed a lively discussion on Jewish identity, dating and belief (or lack of it) in God.

A common interest in sports, a comparison of their experiences in Israel and a few teenage giggles helped break the ice.

"When do you start dating and stuff?" Ali asked her observant counterparts once the conversation turned to social life.

"For marriage," was Chaim's answer. Most of his classmates at the yeshivah will reach that stage in their mid-20s, he said.

Even socializing with girls is discouraged at his yeshivah, he added. Notwithstanding, he seemed quite comfortable as the only male at the table, and assured the reporter that arranging the joint interview hadn't constituted a religious faux pas.

Naomi, who attended Associated Hebrew Day Schools (which has co-ed classes) until Grade 8, has "friends who are guys, but in terms of going out, I think it's pointless if you don't see a future."

Ali can't imagine marrying without having dated other people first. "I think you need experience from breaking up with and going out with people, [to learn] how you deal with situations."

"It's something I wasn't brought up with," remarked Chaim. "I accept that I'll find the right match in the way that so many people do. I think for religious Jews, even though the divorce rate is going up, it's a lot less than for other groups of people."

The conversation took another serious turn when Ali, a student at Lawrence Park Collegiate, mentioned that she doesn't believe in God. "I came to that conclusion, and I don't know why. I just don't [believe]. I've always been [agnostic]."

"Do you mind if I ask you a question?" ventured Chaim. "What does Judaism mean to you if you don't believe in God?"

Ali explained that she derives a sense of Jewish identity through holidays, Shabbat and her connection with Israel, which she visited for the first time last summer.

"You said you believe in Shabbat. What for?" asked Chaim, puzzled.

"Don't worry, you're not insulting me," Ali reassured him, her tone of voice confirming that she took no offence at his question.

"It's a time for family, a time to be together," she explained. She mentioned her affinity for the havdalah ritual, which inspired her to write a poem that appeared in the Toronto Board of Education's annual Creative Writing Book two years ago. (see sidebar)

CJN student panel discovers a bond

When Naomi, a student at Ulpanat Orot girls' high school, explained that she sees Shabbat as "a result of God's having rested" after creating the world in six days, Ali supported her views.

"You're totally right, [but] for me being Jewish is doing my thing, doing what I feel is my way of expressing that I'm Jewish."

For Naomi, Judaism informs every aspect of her life. "I'm Naomi Emerson; I was born in Canada; I'm a Jew — No. I'm Naomi Emerson; one of the reasons I'm me is because I'm Jewish."

The discussion continued at the second meeting. "When I go out on weekends," said Jacob, a student at Northern Secondary School, "you couldn't tell [me] apart from someone who was not Jewish."

Jacob's family is "kind of Conservative," and he stays home Friday nights at his parents' request.

A graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School, Jacob has continued his Jewish education with weekly classes at the Bloor JCC. He feels he is part of the Jewish community, "although it definitely doesn't occupy the majority of my time or the space in my head. That's not to say that it's not important to me, but it doesn't factor in heavily."

"Exactly," agreed Ali.

When Jacob discusses Judaism with his non-Jewish friends, he tends to focus on the "ethnic" aspects, such as food, holiday traditions and Israel.

"I don't talk about God or synagogue a lot. I think it's completely possible to feel strongly the ties to Jewish tradition, but not believe in God. I'm not saying I don't [believe], but it's too complicated an issue to get into."

Part of Jacob's Jewish awareness can be traced to his Canadian-born grandparents. "My grandmother [was raised in] a small town. She has very strong views on Jewish identity," he said.

Naomi's family has maintained a strong Orthodox commitment over five generations in Canada. After her great-great-grandfather immigrated, he used to start a new job on a Monday, then quit on Friday so he could observe Shabbat, and begin the cycle anew the following week, she said.

Nathan, a graduate of United Synagogue Day Schools, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, believes that you can be religious without being observant.

His views on God and Judaism are starting to crystallize, particularly as a result of his Jewish education. One of his courses this year is Rabbinics, in which students discuss issues that include Christianity and conversion.

"It's really strengthening me a lot. In CHAT you have the opportunity to ask so many questions. That's what I do."

Aside from religious feelings and concrete expressions of observance, being Jewish means being part of a community, noted Nathan. "People have a need for community."

In contrast to some of her peers who spend more time in the secular world, Naomi — although she worked at a secular day camp last summer — says that her everyday world is the Jewish world.

To a great extent, her world is that of Orthodox Judaism. But does she feel part of the greater Jewish community?

"Totally," she answered. "If I didn't, I wouldn't be here."

Havdalah

The braided branches of the candle form as one as do our hands
a ceremony to end all rest, but not over yet the candle still to be extinguished in a cup of sweet wine to say the end to many things different for everyone there we all sit in the darkness
all together but yet alone not a word is spoken as we slowly rise to our feet left to deal with this new time what lies ahead no one is sure we all know one thing memories are forever

Shlichim integral to Hebrew education

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Although the number of shlichim (Israeli teachers) has decreased over the years, they continue to be integral members of staff in the Hebrew day schools in Toronto.

Increasing numbers of qualified teachers in Hebrew and Judaic studies are graduating from teacher training programs locally, but day schools continue to bring Israeli teachers to Toronto, usually on a three-year contract, with some Israelis staying for an additional year.

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), which has more than 650 high school students, has nine Israeli teachers.

"Israeli teachers have depth of knowledge and Israeli experience which bring the students the flavor of Israel," says Rabbi Marvin Pachino, CHAT's headmaster. "And they are steeped in the text. They have come up the ranks of being Jewish educators."

He explains that CHAT has a representative in Israel who interviews prospective teachers and observes them in the classroom.

"We have an advantage — someone does the leg work and screens them before I meet the candidates to make my selection."

He notes that Israeli teachers capably teach the philosophy of the school which is "dedicated to transmitting the totality of the Jewish experience, religious teachings, sense of peoplehood, its literature and culture and its national aspirations."

Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Or Chaim (boys' school) and Ulpanot Orot Girls' School, with a combined enrolment of more than 200 students on two separate campuses, has eight Israeli teachers who teach most of the Judaic studies courses. Rabbi Shlomo Gamara, the current rosh yeshivah, is a shaliach.

The Associated Hebrew Day Schools, with some 2,600 students, has three Israeli teachers and an Israeli principal.

Associated's educational director, Rabbi Abraham Soffer, told The CJN that the number of Israeli teachers at Associated "has decreased tremendously over the years. We are able to secure the services of local Hebrew teachers — so shlichim are not as necessary as in the past."

Rabbi Soffer points out that some qualified Israeli teachers have moved to Toronto. These teachers and the shlichim bring the Israeli spirit and ruach to the school.

"It has become more difficult to hire Israeli teachers," he says. "We must bring couples; therefore, both have to teach. It is hard to find qualified couples."

Computers stressed at USDS

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

United Synagogue Day Schools have had a revolution in computer technology.

According to Solomon Kaplinsky, director of education, more than 100 multi-media systems and laptop computers have been purchased and are now housed in state-of-the-art computer laboratories at the school's three campuses.

"The computers are used to enhance the delivery of our educational programs both in general and Judaic studies," Kaplinski says.

Since the computers have been installed, he says, he has noticed a marked difference in children's enthusiasm towards learning. But he cautions that "the computer system is not an end in itself, but rather a means to enhance studies.

"Each campus has a full-time computer expert who acts as coach and works with students and teachers on all the equipment. Teachers do not sit passively while children work on the computers — they are an important part of the learning team."

He says the revolution took one year of planning and came about as a joint effort of professional and lay people. "We are one of the newest schools to upgrade to such an extent. We have gone from the dinosaur age to a state-of-the-art school. It really is very exciting."

Solomon Kaplinsky, USDS' director of education, looks on as Grade 6 students Erin Schachter (left) and Erin Cooperberg work on school computers.

Students get at least one hour per week of class time to work on the computers, Kaplinski says, can join a computer club and are permitted to use them during recess.

"There is something magical about placing a computer screen in front of a child. They become enticed to learn," he says.

"Computers can be used to suit the needs of each individual student. The children can move at their own pace and it makes learning fun. As well, computers are networked between campuses so all teachers can work together."

Adult education flourishing

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

A more comprehensive program of adult Jewish education for the 15,000 Jewish residents living south of St. Clair Avenue is underway at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) under the umbrella of the just-formed Downtown Jewish Learning Council (DJLC).

There is no shortage of adult programs in the north, either, with Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and secular groups offering courses in addition to wide-ranging programs of individual synagogues.

Aish HaTorah and Ohr Somayach are among groups reaching out to people who want to reconnect to their Jewish roots. Both are active in Thornhill and the Bathurst corridor and Ohr Somayach recently opened a downtown learning centre on the 16th floor at 18 King St. E.

Kolel, a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, offers programs in Thornhill, the Bathurst corridor, downtown offices, private homes and in Mississauga. For the first time it is offering courses in cooperation with the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the Downtown Jewish Learning Council and B'nai Brith Canada.

A whole variety of programs for seniors are available at the Betel Centre for Creative Learning and the Wagman Centre.

Most of the increase in the Jewish populations south of St. Clair Avenue is in the west Annex area north of Bloor Street, according to Joan Schoenfeld, DJLC chair. The newcomers are mostly from the United States and Montreal, she said. Though the most numerous group attending DJLC classes are young marrieds, there are many couples and retired people seeking knowledge.

One of the classes offered at the DJLC on four Wednesdays in May is How to Raise a Mentsch given by Rabbi Mitch Mandel, Aish HaTorah director of Outreach, and Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik of the Village Shul.

In addition to the Shul Primer (everything you always wanted to know about Shabbat, but were afraid to ask!) Aish HaTorah is presenting the STEP program (Skills for Torah Enrichment and emPowerment) directed by Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz. STEP offers four courses for men, one course, Women and Mitzvot--the Inner Dimension for women and a host of courses at both intermediate and advanced levels for both men and women.

"It's an enormous jump for us," said Rabbi Avram Rothman, Ohr Somayach executive director, referring to their new location downtown.

The Bathurst Jewish Centre is always a hive of activity for adults seeking to improve their knowledge of Jewish subjects and their skills in dance, music, drawing, painting and soapstone sculpture at the Koffler Centre, said director Joan Tooke.

At that location, the Institute for Jewish Learning (IJL) is collaborating in courses with the Koffler Centre, Kolel and Aish HaTorah, said Marlee Pinsker, director. A four-week course on Mondays in February, in cooperation with the Koffler Gallery, is titled Let There Be Light, and involves students using art and writing in a creative approach to the Bible.

Commening on the innovative offerings at the IJL, Pinsker said: "The community is changing and we must change with it."

A 10-week seminar, beginning in February, on Modern Jewish Feminist Thought is offered by Kolel at both the Canadian Centre for Reform Judaism and the Bloor JCC, said director Rabbi Elyse M. Goldstein.

Doing Jewish (Basic Judaism) is offered for 12 weeks beginning in February at the Bloor JCC by Kolel. The class includes field trips to a Jewish funeral home, mikvah, synagogue and Shabbat dinner.

Teenagers' motivation seen as essential to their education

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's not too late to give your teenager a full Jewish high school education even if he or she has never attended a Jewish day school. But the student must be highly motivated to succeed, say educators.

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) has been running a program for students without a day school background for 20 years. The students who are accepted into this program are "highly motivated and stick it through," says Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster of CHAT.

"They are prepared to take on the burden of the double program — the homework, the assignments," he says. "They have made a decision consciously."

The school evaluates applicants' academic skills and carries out interviews to determine whether or not these students have the motivation to make the adjustment to the double curriculum, he explains.

"We get the feeling of who can handle it after seeing them."

All students need to know how to read and write Hebrew, but the level of the class of 15 to 20 students varies from year to year and the school makes the adjustment accordingly, Rabbi Pachino says.

Core topics

The Jewish studies program for this special stream is made up of four core subjects — Bible, rabbinic literature, Hebrew language and literature and Jewish history.

The other CHAT students study the same core subjects, but for them, Hebrew is the language of instruction.

The National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), a youth movement affiliated with the Orthodox community, operates Free Torah High, a supplementary Jewish education program for students at secular schools in grades 7 to OAC. With five locations in the Greater Toronto Area, the program serves an average of 80 to 100 students a year.

"It's a basic program, an alternative program to keep them [the teenagers] involved in Judaism at a level they can appreciate," says Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY.

Every year a handful of students become more committed to Judaism and decide to switch to full-time study at a Jewish high school program, such as Ner Israel Yeshiva or CHAT. Free Torah High facilitates their transition, Black says. "When a kid comes to us and needs some help we're there for them."

NCSY becomes an intermediary between the student and the school, advocating on behalf of the student. Black says his program arranges for tutoring and whatever support is necessary. Students who have previously attended day school usually need less help.

Day schools mourn Rabin with services, candles

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The death of Yitzhak Rabin had a profound effect on students and staff at Hebrew schools across the city.

Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck Day School, said that the first day back to school after the assassination, students arrived to find a lowered flag and a glowing yahrzeit candle.

"We kept the candle burning throughout the shivah, so we would all be reminded of what happened," Gardner said.

"When the students came to school that day, we immediately ushered them into an assembly where we talked about Rabin's life and long career, his goals for peace, and about the sacredness of life. We had discussed whether or not to have the assembly and the teachers decided that the school should be together as a community. We made the right decision, because we got tremendous feedback about how moved the children were with the assembly.

She said that during the week, students learned the Song of Peace, which was sung at the last rally Rabin attended.

Yitzhak Rabin

"On the first Shabbat, we sang that song and read some poems written by senior children. Loonies collected from the students were used to plant Israeli trees in Rabin's name," she added.

Rabbi Shlomo Brown, principal of Ulpanat Orot High School, said his staff is made up of Israelis and everyone was shocked and dismayed about Rabin's death.

"At our assembly, we said a few prayers and showed the girls part of the funeral. We later made ribbons for the North York ceremony, which most of the girls attended without any encouragement from us," Rabbi Brown said.

"At a Shabbaton the following week-end, we discussed the individual and society and how there can be such major disagreements amongst people."

At Temple Sinai Religious School, an assembly was held the day following the assassination for children in kindergarten to Grade 6, as well as for parents and any others who had been at the Temple for the morning minyan.

"Ira Schweitzer, our director of education, spoke about the death of a great leader, and rather than being melancholy, turned the assembly into a positive experience for the students and adults," says assistant principal Charlotte Koven-Feldbloom.

She added that the students who are part of the temple's university-college department and are now living in Israel wrote pieces for the department's newsletter and shared with their peers a first-hand view of goings-on in Israel.

Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster of CHAT, said he spoke to the students at a school-wide memorial assembly held the first day back at school after the assassination.

"The teachers dealt with individual questions in their classrooms. The assembly was a time for Psalms and community remembrance. Later on in the week, we signed a condolence book and sent it on to the Israeli Consulate for transmission to Mrs. Rabin."

Parents urged to support key values

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Parental responsibility in Jewish day schools goes beyond academic support and behavioral concerns.

Several educators across the religious spectrum say they expect parents to take an active interest in their children's education, but they also expect them to uphold the values of the school.

"There has to be harmony between the home and the school otherwise the children will suffer greatly from the conflict." Young minds can't handle such conflict, Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, principal of Beth Jacob, an Orthodox high school for girls, told The CJN.

Parents should be role models for their children and "practise what they expect of their children," he said. "Our school has certain objectives. Parents who send their child to this school should examine their objectives and decide if this school meets their objectives."

A school cannot adapt to parents; parents have to adjust to what a school does, and therefore parents should choose a school that best reflects their own values, he said.

Dr. Uri Korin, principal of Bialik Hebrew Day School, also stressed the importance of consistency between the home and the school environment, and the necessity for parents to support the school's philosophy.

"If there is a conflict of values, parents can change their way of life or remove their child from the school," he said. "It is unfair to put a child in two worlds."

Bialik, which is Zionistic in orientation, has a well-estabished philosophy; but not every parent thinks the teaching of four languages is necessary and some want more physical education and arts programs. However, it's not possible to change parts of the curriculum to satisfy such individuals, Korin said.

Korin encourages parents to communicate with the school, because he see the education of a child as a "partnership between the school and the home," he said. The school should feel free to discuss issues with parents and parents should feel comfortable to ask questions, he added.

Solly Kaplinski, educational director of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) told The CJN he sees parents as part of the decision-making process, but they are also expected to support the school's educational and religious goals vis à vis the acquisition of academic skills and competency in religious practices.

EDUCATION

Education a family affair

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Jewish education in Toronto is branching out in a new direction, as educators beginning to target entire families.

A group of educators and spiritual leaders have sent a proposal to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to have a family educator who would develop programs for the whole community, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation told The CJN.

His own congregation has created a position for a family educator and is in the process of hiring, he said.

"We're beginning to realize that it's not enough to educate a child. The child lives in an environment. We need a framework for the family.

"Synagogues are the gateway to most young Jewish families," he said. "By strengthening these kinds of programs they are strengthening these families.

"Baby boomers and their children are looking for enjoyable educational experiences and good quality time together," he said.

"Family education isn't seen as a substitute. It's seen as another angle into the soul and the life blood of Jews."

Dr. Reuven Robbins, director of education and youth at Beth Tzedec, stressed the need for a family educator, because, he said, too many of the synagogue's programs — for example the religious school, adult education and youth programs — segment families.

A synagogue-wide family education program would bring families together, he said. "A generation or two ago, Jewish families did Jewish things together in the home. Today there is some practice, but there is less of a knowledge base. The synagogues need to be the impetus to bring the families together to learn to do the rituals."

Dr. Ira Schweitzer, director of education at Temple Sinai, runs one of the most extensive family education programs in the greater Toronto area. Parents cannot drop their children off "UPS-style" and expect them to get a Jewish education, he told The CJN.

Parents as partners

"Supplementary Jewish education cannot succeed if we don't involve the entire family ... Our task is to make the parents partners in the process."

The supplementary program, which runs five hours a week 30 weeks a year, cannot provide the same level of Jewish education as the day schools, which have the students five days a week, 40 weeks a year, he said.

Schweitzer has set up several family education programs, from the monthly Tot Shabbat for preschoolers and their families, to the family life course on Jewish social issues for high school students and their parents, run by professional family communicators.

Parent And Child Education (PACE), an optional program for grades 4, 5 and 6 students attending the temple's religious school program, has been running for four years. One-third of the parents or approximately 20 at each grade level opt in, joining their child in study one Sunday a month, Schweitzer said.

Synagogues, which are "institutions for family living," need to initiate family learning expriences, he said. "It's part of being a total temple to the family."

"Children can only have Jewish commitment if they see Judaism as a way of life," according to Karen Goodis, principal of the religious school at Shaar Shalom Synagogue. "They can't do that if it [Judaism] only happens at school."

Goodis has been running a family education program for grades 6 and 7 students and their parents for three years and she gets practically perfect attendance, she said. Parents and children meet together four times a year to learn different aspects of prayer or halachic practice.

"Family education is a critical need. We're dealing with many parents who do not have a strong Jewish education," she noted. "They want to be involved in Judaism and they need the tools to do it.

"Family education is a link to continuity. Part of continuity is teaching families how to be Jewish and to be committed. And you can't be committed if you don't know anything," Goodis said.

Yiddish flourishing in Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Yiddish will continue to be alive and well in Toronto if the Committee for Yiddish of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has anything to say about it.

Director Sylvia Lustgarten reports that the committee is involved in two new projects.

The Yiddish Teacher Training Course is being attended by 15 students, who are interested in learning the methodology of teaching, and in upgrading their own Yiddish.

The course is being taught by Ellie Kellman, who teaches Yiddish at the University of Toronto and at YIVO-Columbia Yiddish summer school.

As well, for the first time in many years, Lustgarten says, some 15 students are studying Yiddish for high school and OAC credit. Discussions have also been instituted to have Yiddish taught at CHAT, she says.

Classes for adults are "continuing and improving, so that a new, younger generation can learn the language of our great Ashkenazi tradition," says Lustgarten.

In fact, the Committee for Yiddish itself has been restructuring and rethinking its programs, in order to modernize itself "so that it can appeal to a new generation."

The University of Toronto Committee for Yiddish Studies is trying to raise an endowment to "give Yiddish courses [there] permanence and stability."

Long-time programming continues: adult classes in private homes, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Earl Haig Collegiate, Bialik and other locations, and groups in synagogues and organizations. Luncheon groups at the Primrose Club and with well-known Toronto personality Ben Kayfetz are very successful.

Lustgarten noted that the Committee for Yiddish has taken an active role in conferences recently, especially Women's Voices.

Supplementary schools stress warmth, individual growth

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Both Ohavei Torah and Chabad Lubavitch supplementary Hebrew schools stress the importance of warm and professional teachers, a stimulating environment and a love of Judaism.

Ohavei Torah, a private school which rents space at Beth Radom Synagogue, currently runs classes for junior kindergarten students, as well as those in grades 5 to 8.

Principal and director Baruch Rand says that in this first year of operation, the school has initiated the integrated learning system which "emphasizes learning in a variety of senses such as music, art, drama and movement.

"This approach works well because many students do not respond well to oral teaching, but rather, work better through other senses. It is a totally different approach. Often, young children do not remember what they learn, but when they use all their senses, their long-term memory is developed," says Rand, who was formally trained in the integrated learning system.

He says students act out Bible stories, do Bible-related artwork and learn about prayers and holidays.

"This is not a conversation or language immersion class. Students get a subliminal knowledge of the language through our other activities. There is a unit on the alphabet, in which children learn to recognize the letters, but they are not yet reading."

Rand says he is quite excited about a new day school he and local educator Gail Baker are set to open in the same location in September 1996.

"Gail specializes in alternative educational techniques and will be able to assess what type of instruction each child needs. The school is prepared to take in underachievers, those who have potential but are unable to respond to certain ways of teaching. These children often flourish in an integrated learning setting. We plan a lot of music, art and sports, in order to develop the body and mind simultaneously."

Chabad Lubavitch Hebrew School, under the direction of Rabbi Meir Gitlin, now has 400 students in kindergarten to Grade 8, in three locations across the city — Wilshire Public School and Thornlea High School, both in Thornhill, and Forest Hill Public School in north Toronto.

Rabbi Gitlin says his school is unique in that "kids actually love coming. The teachers enjoy teaching and they really relate to the children — they speak the children's language."

The curriculum focuses on "everything that is important in Judaism — Hebrew language, history, prayer, mitzvahs, keeping a kosher home and Jewish ceremonies," Rabbi Gitlin says.

The school is made up of public school children from unaffiliated, Reform or Conservative homes, he says. "The children are given the opportunity of learning what Orthodox Judaism is about. We explain it, and if someday they choose to live that way, they will understand it all. We give them an appreciation of the beauty of our heritage and we explain why Jews do what they do."

York's teacher education courses successful

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The successful teacher training program inaugurated seven years ago at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies has shown that it can successfully train teachers in Judaic studies, who are fluent in Hebrew, in a Canadian university setting.

Martin Lockshin, a professor at the Centre for Jewish Studies and coordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program, says that while studying Judaica and Hebrew, the students can also experience the stimulating, intellectual environment of the university.

Currently 28 students are enrolled in the program. Some students study for a year in an Israeli university as part of the program, as three students are presently doing. As well, students receive on-the-job training at several Hebrew day schools in Toronto.

Graduates of the program are working in Hebrew day schools in Toronto, other cities in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Students generally apply after having completed one year of university study, although a few enter after completing their bachelor's degree. Lockshin says students are expected to have some serious background in Jewish studies before entering the program and most have fluency or near-fluency in modern Hebrew.

"But a student without a strong background in Hebrew language, who is willing to work hard and become fluent in Hebrew, will also be considered," he adds.

Students who complete the Teacher Training Program receive a bachelor of arts degree, usually with a major in Jewish Studies, a bachelor of education degree, an Ontario Ministry of Education and Training Certificate and certification by the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. They are then qualified to teach in Jewish studies or general studies programs at a Hebrew school, or in the public school system.

There are four areas of study: Jewish Studies content courses, which could deal with Bible, philosophy, history, Holocaust or the sociology of the Jewish community; educational method and theory courses — the same courses studied by all students at York who are training to be teachers; methods of teaching Jewish studies, including how to teach Hebrew as a second language and how to teach about the Jewish holidays; and general education courses offered to all York students.

Lockshin says the Ontario government's financial cutbacks have been "cushioned" by the support of outside funding, noting for example, "a generous grant" received from the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation.

"In fact, we hope that next year we will have more courses and more faculty members in the program and perhaps also more students than this year."

As well, the centre is hoping to expand the teacher training program with an in-service program to help teachers presently teaching to upgrade their teaching skills.

Ethics learned from school, home

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

How do schools teach ethics? This question was recently posed to educators at a number of Hebrew schools.

The Board does not legislate the teaching of ethics, says Rabbi Irwin Witty, the executive director of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. Each school establishes its own methods of teaching lessons in ethical behavior.

Rabbi Witty says there are three elements in teaching ethics — the teachers, lessons from the sacred texts and parents.

Teachers, he says, must be models of ethical behavior in the way they lead their lives, the way they relate to the students and the way they deal with situations in the classroom.

Students learn through the study of the sacred texts, but also learn behaviors which are not officially part of the curriculum, such as waiting their turn and saying please and thank you. And they learn from parents, who should also be ethical models, he says.

"Teaching ethics is done subliminally," says Rabbi Witty. "Judaism must be caught, not taught."

Rabbi Abraham Soffer, educational director at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools, the largest day school in the country, says ethics must be part of any subject taught in Judaic or general studies.

"A child learns ethics at home from parents, grandparents and others. The teacher must be a role model for proper ethics. Children learn by example."

He says the school teaches Ethics of the Fathers, which is filled with ethical rules.

He believes the role of the school is to help students develop morals and identity "so they can make their own decisions — so they can make choices."

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, the 800 students learn the meaning of the word "mentshlechkeit," says the principal, Dr. Uri Korin. "You cannot teach values but you can bring students to internalize certain beliefs and models of behavior."

Among Bialik's goals are: to teach one's responsibility to perpetuate the bond with Jews throughout the world; to foster an understanding and respect for racial and cultural differences within our society; and to help students gain a sense of respect for themselves, for others and for their environment.

A number of projects have been developed based on these goals.

Korin cites tzedakah projects, such as collecting money for the Jewish National Fund (JNF), which goes far beyond collecting money. Discussions take place on the work of JNF to help the stu-

Education a birthright: Witty

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Although the number of students has increased this year at the 70 full-time and supplementary Jewish schools in the greater Toronto area, Rabbi Irwin E. Witty, long-time executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, expresses the hope that attendance will climb even higher.

Total enrolment for the current academic year is 16,554 students, a healthy increase of 542 over last year's figure of 16,012 students. According to Rabbi Witty, the most impressive growth occurred at the high school level, where the number of students increased from 1,402 to 1,529.

"We're delighted with the number of children in Jewish education, and our figures put us above many Jewish communities south of the border," he said. "But we are very cognizant of the fact that we're not reaching any more than about 50 per cent of Jewish youngsters."

Sitting in his small, cluttered office in the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street, Rabbi Witty runs his fingers down a page of statistics as if poring over a report card. Year by year over his 27 years on the board, the white-bearded dean of Jewish education in Toronto has seen a consistent rise in Hebrew day school enrolment, which has roughly kept pace with the growth of the city's Jewish population, currently estimated at more than 165,000.

"I believe that Jewish education is the birthright of every Jewish child, and that parents have a moral obligation to provide the type of long-term exposure to Jewish education that we provide in our schools," he said.

However, the sustained growth in enrolment has resulted in space shortages in many schools, he acknowledged. "Some schools are having difficulty. Demand has expanded but the space has not."

There are 23 full-time Hebrew day schools, including 15 elementary schools and eight high schools in the Toronto area; two small elementary schools, She'arim and Zareinu, cater to special education needs. There are also 47 supplementary schools, not all affiliated with the board. While two supplementary schools closed this year (Rosedale-Moore Park and Workmen's Circle), three new ones opened.

Combined, the day schools and supplementary schools employ a staff pool of more than 1,300 teachers, principals, supervisors and specialists and require a total operating cost of about $60 million annually. According to Rabbi Witty, the number of shlichim, teachers from Israel, in the Jewish school system has decreased steadily. Five years ago, some 50 shlichim were teaching our children; today, there are no more than 15.

"Finding first-class teachers remains one of our biggest challenges," said Rabbi Witty. Two local seminaries are now turning out qualified Jewish school teachers: the York University Program in Jewish Teacher Education, and Midrasha l'Morim.

With tuition fees upwards of $6,000 per student per year, many Jewish parents have been forced to regard Jewish education as a luxury rather than a necessity. However, some $6.5 million is currently available as day-school subsidies, reduced from a previous high of $7 million.

"The amount requested by needy parents is much more than this, but there's just no money out there," said Rabbi Witty. Like others in the Jewish education system, he eagerly awaits a Supreme Court ruling expected Jan. 24 on whether Ontario public school funding can be extended to cover the province's Jewish schools.

Overall, Rabbi Witty gives good passing grades to a Jewish education system that has kept up with demand, he says, but still hasn't reached far enough into Reform and unaffiliated Jewish homes, where most of the Jewish population resides. He also expresses a wish that more parents from more committed Jewish homes would keep their children in Jewish schools beyond the elementary years.

"My number one priority is to maintain and promote a campaign for increased enrolment in Jewish schools," he said. "We need to educate parents that Jewish education is something that has to be carried through the junior and high school levels."

Values, ethics taught in practical way

dents understand what their money is used for.

When visiting Canada, Israeli soldiers attend school assemblies and Bialik students correspond with the soldiers.

Other projects include work with the elderly and people with disabilities. They take part in-depth discussions with elderly people and participate in projects to sensitize the young people to the problems an impaired elderly person must cope with. This is linked with the study of Jewish ethics in the Talmud on treating the elderly.

As well, students socialize with children who have disabilities, in order to develop empathy and sympathy.

"Therefore," says Korin, "how you should treat people is sprinkled throughout the curriculum and the text is not only a holy book but a practical document on how people should treat people."

Of importance, he says, is teaching that you cannot resolve problems by fighting. Programs such as the "peace makers" project are created for students to resolve conflicts with other students in a peaceful way.

"This peer-helping-peer program has been very successful and the need to use consequences has been minimized.'"

As well, a mechanech (educator) project was developed to train teachers to be spokespersons who deal with problems between students or between teachers and students, and to serve as a bridge between home and school.

And a Life and Value Education (LAVE) project brings students and mechanech teachers together to examine the things which are positive and negative to them.

Korin notes that whenever a student has a birthday party, the child is asked to bring an unwrapped gift for a less fortunate child.

"This project of the federation internalizes true tzedakah, and the box is always getting gifts," says Korin.

Beth Jacob High School for Girls' objective is to help the 360 students "develop into ethical human beings," says Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, the principal.

"For this reason, we do not teach them ethics per se, because this type of study by definition excludes personal imperatives and in so doing, serves to militate against them. Instead, we teach them Torah, the 613 mitzvot (commandments) that we received on Mount Sinai, which branch into numerous details."

He explains that the mitzvot include specific guidelines for behavior that denote respect for parents, elders and others; kindness to others and charitable activities; sensitivity to others; honesty, in and out of school; and responsibility to community.

"Through the assiduous study and diligent practice of these mitzvot, our students develop traits of character that form the substance of the ethical behavior."

At Eitz Chaim Schools, which have 1,150 students at three branches, two for girls and one for boys, Rabbi Aaron Levine, the principal of the boys' school, told The CJN, "Any subject we teach involves the teaching of ethics. Our introduction to Torah is based upon ethics and mentshlechkeit — decency, respect, compassion and sensitivity."

'Decency, respect, compassion and sensitivity'

He adds that they are constantly finding appropriate ethical lessons and teachings that tie in with the text being studied.

He spoke of Abraham's example of the true meaning of hachnasat orchim (welcoming guests to your home) or visiting the sick.

"Every text studied lends itself to bringing an ethical discussion and making it ethically practical to the students' daily lives."

At Temple Sinai School, the 500 students who attend the supplementary Hebrew school have numerous programs to teach ethics at each grade level.

At the beginning of the year, every class begins with a discussion on behavioral expectations for their own class, says Charlotte Koven-Feldbroom, assistant principal, who oversees kindergarten to Grade 6.

She describes the teaching of derech eretz (respect for others) to the younger students.

"The children discuss how to treat each other and how they want to be treated," she says.

As a community within the classroom, they talk about what kind of environment is best for learning and determine what they want in their own environment.

"In our school, we talk a lot about how human beings should treat each other; we cover respect, consideration and tolerance."

She notes that today, there are many students "who are facing increased pressure from family breakdown. Part of our function is to make kids feel that they are safe and respected and help them develop a proud dynamic Jewish identity which is a reflection of living an ethical Jewish life."

In Grade 5, students study how we take care of our Jewish community. Social action and hands-on responsibility get the students involved in the community.

Dr. I. Schweitzer, director of education at Temple Sinai, who is responsible for the students from Grade 7 up, says the students learn the mitzvot through living experiences. The upper grades do research and choose their own projects.

To understand Jewish values such as feeding the hungry, students in Grade 8 were given $17.50 and told to shop for a week as if they were on welfare. They met with a dietitian to see if what they had purchased met the criteria for a balanced diet.

Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) says the high school students deal with a whole range of ethical issues within a rabbinic framework, including biomedical concerns, homosexuality, abortion and reproductive technology in terms of their ethical implications.

"Society is so open and permissive," says Rabbi Pachino, "that very often today, the only value they hold is what is good for me and pleasure. What we stand for runs against the tide of society's behavior."

Through class discussions and informal discussion groups based on source material and texts, both classical and modern, the high school students deal with honesty and verbal and behavioral ethics.

Intense, colorful paintings demand viewer's involvement

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Paul Peregal's paintings, exhibited recently at Gallery Louise Smith, throb with life. Strongly expressionist with bold outline, intense color and emotion, they demand involvement.

Peregal paints his portraits, scenes and not-so-still lifes to music. "When the music stops, I stop," he says.

His high rise studio in Toronto's Annex, is stocked with jazz and classical cassettes and the music or reading in which he immerses himself, is sympathetic to the work at hand.

"I'll put on a jazz combo when I'm doing my jazz musicians, a chamber quartet as inspiration for a landscape," he notes.

Peregal has done four studies and a definitive portrait of Dylan Thomas, painting as he listens to the poet reading his own verse.

Peregal immerses himself in music.

His Matisse is a compendium of all that he knows and feels about the artist. And he reaches into the soul of the Italian/Swiss sculptor, Giacometti, darling of the existentialists.

Occasionally his subjects are real people, like Coltrane (Bird). More often they come from within, pulled out by the music. His canvas, Harlem Nocturne, named for a piece by Duke Ellington, juxtaposes a nighttime saxophonist and trombonist, caught up in their own sound. Three's a Crowd, exposes the competitive nature of the jazz player as three musicians vie for solo attention.

The Paris of the '20s fascinates Peregal. Madame Bijoux, a rivetting portrait of a woman well past middle age, flamboyant in a red hat and many strands of faux pearls, a glass of wine at hand, conjures a scene from a Paris bistro of the period.

Actually, Peregal, sensitive, bearded, looks as if he has just emerged from an attic studio in Montmartre. However, born in Portland, Me, raised in Montreal, now based in Toronto, he has lived and worked in diverse settings such as Israel, the Gaspe, London, Copenhagen.

Now in his 40s, he responded to the call of Israel "my heritage," in his earlier years, giving familiar landmarks like the Western Wall, his distinctive touch.

Peregal uses acrylics and through painstaking experimentation, layering the paints sometimes translucently, sometimes almost opaquely, or drawing a thick brush full of many colors across the canvas, has achieved remarkable effects. His works exploit the quick driving quality of acrylics to achieve the nuance and strength of oils.

Peregal attended the School of Art and Design, Montreal Museum of Fine Arts under the directorship of Arthur Lismer. He also studied painting, sculpture and design at Ecole des Beaux Arts in Montreal.

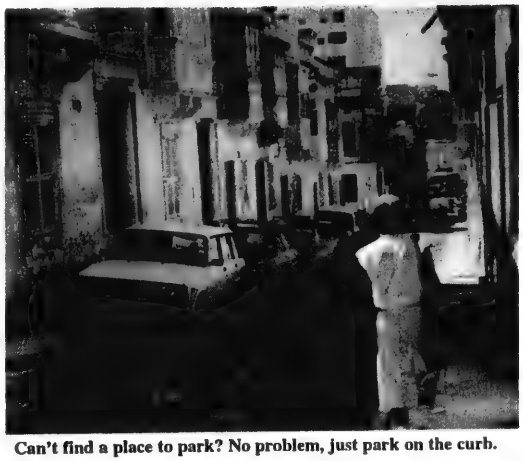
Island of Malta remains a jewel of the Mediterranean

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News Editor



Can't find a place to park? No problem, just park on the curb.

SLIEMA, Malta – Although ignored as a travel destination by many North Americans "doing Europe," the tiny Mediterranean island of Malta has always been a draw for thousands of Europeans looking to escape their bleak, rainy summers.

Situated right in the heart of the Mediterranean, just south of Sicily, this former British colony is made up of three islands and is easily accessible by air from virtually every European airport.

With a warm and dry summer climate – rain is rare between June and September – it is obvious that tourism would be Malta's chief industry. From about April to October, the island's population of around 330,000 doubles with visitors of all ages – mainly older English couples or much younger German, Belgian, French and other university-age travellers.

Malta has something to please all visitors. For those seeking sun, sea and sand, the "Island of Sunshine," as Malta bills itself, has much to offer.

The north part of the island has many beaches with soft, golden sand and calm, turquoise waters. The beaches on the southern part of Malta and along the east coast are rocky and are excellent for diving or snorkelling. Watch out for passing speed boats that often come too close to the shore, despite the laws against it.

For history buffs, the Maltese interior is virtually a self-contained museum. The former capital city of Mdina, a walled-in city closed to traffic, dates back 3,000 years. Until the Knights of Malta arrived in the 16th century and set up Valletta, now the capital, by the Grand Harbor, Mdina served as the political centre of the island.

Although much of it was rebuilt after an earthquake in 1693, there are still original sections that survive.

From a vantage point at the top of the city you can see the entire island sprawled below you. A great photo opportunity. A small, quiet patio-restaurant allows you to enjoy a cappuchino while you gaze at the splendor of the view below. The Mdina Dungeons are medieval dungeons restored to all their dubious glory with wax victims and all sorts of wonderful instruments of torture dreamed up by the Inquisitors.

For the younger crowd, Paceville is the place to go. The small town is basically wall-to-wall nightclubs, jazz clubs, hi-tech discos and quieter bars. Any day after 10 p.m., the town is crawling with young tourists hopping from one bar to another. North Americans might have to get acculturated to seeing young teens at bars drinking. Bars stay open till early in the morning and it's always fun haggling with a cab driver to get back to your hotel.

Their are two types of taxis in Malta. One is the "White" Wembley taxis, which normally have set prices. Try and avoid the "Black" independent taxis, as they will rip off their own mothers. If you have to take one, make sure you agree on a set price before you get in the cab. Never argue with a cab driver once you're in the car, as drivers are prone to letting their fists fly loose.

You can always take a bus. They're cheap (a buck will get you anywhere), but they stop running by 11 p.m. (and often break down before then) so getting to your hotel at night might be a problem.

For approximately $40 to $60 a day, you can rent a modern car, although keep in mind automatics are hard to find. Remember that in Malta you drive on the left and also remember you take your life in your hands whenever you get behind the wheel.

Traffic laws are basically non-existent. There are few stop signs and traffic lights are sparse. Speed limits are not posted and no one seems to know what they are. When driving through an intersection just hold your breath, shut your eyes, honk your horn and hope for the best. Good luck.

And have fun parking. Because the island is so small and relatively affluent, there are many cars and few parking spaces. Cars frequently park on sidewalks and any crevice into which they can squeeze their Fiats.

The island is so small you will rarely have to use transportation of any type. Get a good pair of walking shoes and walk. The town of Sliema is a good place to be. There are plenty of hotels, restaurants and rocky beaches. The Captain Morgan cruise ships, which offer day tours of Malta and its sister islands Comino and Gozo, leave from Sliema. But because it is the most commercial town in Malta, you will find it the most expensive. Breakfast for two (eggs, toast, juice and coffee) can run you $12.

The Maltese currency is the lira. One lira buys you approximately $4. You can exchange your Canadian dollars at many convenient instabanks in Sliema, Valletta and some of the other commercial towns.

To get away from the hustle of the crowds and traffic in the mainland, take the ferry boat to Gozo, the larger of the two other islands.

Gozo has escaped the commercialization of Malta. You will find fewer night clubs there, but also fewer noisy tourists. The main beach in Gozo, Ramla Bay, (or Red Sands) is a picturesque, Martian-like landscape with dark, red sand.

If you speak English you will have little trouble getting by in Malta. Because it was a British colony until 1967, English is spoken fluently and most of the professional class still use English as their language of choice.

The native, Maltese language is a Semitic-based language fairly similar to Hebrew and Arabic tongues. The Maltese people are extremely easy-going and laid-back. Nobody seems to be in a rush to do anything, particularly in summer, and nothing should be done now that can't wait till after the afternoon siesta. This aspect of the Maltese character can be somewhat frustrating when you want service quickly, like at a restaurant where you may have to wait 15 minutes before a waiter takes your order.

Geographically, Malta is similar to Israel. The coastline is surrounded by the Mediterranean and the interior is mostly rocky and dotted with farms. Driving through a country road, you will undoubtedly come across 100 sheep in front of you lazing down the road in typical Maltese style. No use honking at them. Just wait.

INFLATION RATE PLUMMETS

JERUSALEM – Israel's inflation rate for 1995 plummeted from the previous year's 14.5 percent to 8.1 percent the lowest in 26 years the Central Bureau of Statistics announced.

"We are in a period of stable inflation," Finance Minister Avraham Shohat said.

Shohat attributed the lower-than-expected inflation to a combination of factors, including increased imports, the high supply of housing and the government's monetary policy.

After a year of political wrangling with Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel, Shohat refused to attribute the success directly to Frenkel's decision to raise interest rates or to take full responsibility for the good news. Instead, he said, "The economy and the government's policies must be seen in their totality."

However, some people were skeptical about the results.

"The fact that we achieved an inflation rate of only eight percent in 1995 is a very positive sign, but it would have been preferable to end the year with a 10 percent inflation rate and a $3 billion balance of payments deficit, instead of eight percent inflation and $4.2 billion deficit," said Manufacturers Association president Dan Propper.

BANKS TO CLOSE FRIDAYS

JERUSALEM – All Israeli banks will be closed on Fridays as of March 1, following an agreement reached recently between the Histadrut and banks.

Bank workers and the Histadrut have been fighting for a five-day work week for the past eight years. Until now, the move was held up by firm opposition from Bank Leumi and the Chambers of Commerce.

They proposed closing the banks on Sunday, as is the custom in other countries, and argued that closing them on Friday would obstruct business transactions.

Consumer groups and bank customers also objected to a Friday-closing, as this is the day on which much of the public runs errands.

Not all the banks have officially announced the change, but Histadrut chair Amir Peretz declared that the decision binds all the banks.

BANK REPORT OPTIMISTIC

JERUSALEM – The Israeli economy continued to expand in all its major industries during the fourth quarter, and is bound to continue its growth in the first quarter of the year, according to the Bank of Israel's seasonal survey of companies' activities published last week.

MORIAH HOTEL SIGNS AGREEMENT WITH RADISSON

JERUSALEM – Israel is on the verge of becoming a "boiling market" for tourism with an explosion in the demand for hotel rooms, once all the borders with neigboring countries are opened, says the president and CEO of worldwide Radisson SAS Hotels.

Kurt Ritter was speaking at a press conference in Tel Aviv last week to mark the signing of a franchise marketing agreement with the Moriah Hotel Chain, whose hotels are to be known as Radisson Moriah hotels.

According to the agreement, Moriah has the sole franchise rights for Israel and Jordan.

ISRAEL RANKS 66TH IN ECONOMIC FREEDOM INDEX

JERUSALEM – Israel has been ranked 66th out of 103 countries in an index released recently measuring the level of economic freedom.

The Economic Freedom of the World report compiled by the Fraser Institute of Canada judged to what extent citizens of each country are free to engage in various economic activities.

Among the criteria of economic freedom surveyed in the report were ability to hold foreign currency; possibility to trade with foreigners; the level of marginal tax; the role of the public sector in the economy; and the extent of subsidization.

Canucks grab gold at Pan Am Maccabi in Argentina

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Canada East and Canada West met in the finals of the softball competition at the Pan Am Maccabi Games in Argentina. Canada ended up winning the gold.

TORONTO — It's been said th Canada could ice two equally adept hockey teams for international events and the B squad would be better than the top team from most other countries.

Well, the sport was softball and the international competition was the eighth Pan American Maccabi Games in Buenos Aires, but Canada managed to do on the baseball diamond what prognosticators have predicted for the hockey rink.

Two Canadian entries — Canada West and Canada East — eliminated all opposition and faced off in the final, gold medal softball game with nothing on the line but team pride and bragging rights.

Canada West, which consisted in large part of the same elite unit that captured the gold medal at the 1993 Maccabiah Games in Israel, defeated Canada East by a 6-1 margin to take home the Pan American Maccabi gold medal. Canada East got the silver.

The two medals were part of a 10-medal haul at the recently-completed games that included two golds, four silvers and four bronzes. Montrealer Melanie Herskovitch, 13, was the star of the Canadian show, winning three silver and three bronze medals in junior swimming events.

Out on the diamond, Canada showed its mettle, with both teams overcoming adversity to get to the medal podium.

Canada East finished the round-robin portion of the event with a 2-3 record, good for fourth place in the six-team event. Argentina finished second and the United States third, while Mexico and Panama were eliminated from the medal hunt.

Canada West finished the five-game round robin in first place with a 4-0-1 record before meeting the tough U.S. squad in the semi-finals.

In three previous Maccabiahs in Israel, the Canadians have faced their American cousins each time for the gold medal, losing by narrow margins in 1985 and '89, but finally winning in '93.

The '96 semi-final "was a great ball game with superb defence" and an exciting Canadian comeback, said head coach Brian Revin.

Canada West trailed 2-1 going into the bottom of the final inning. U.S. pitcher David Blackburn, a 280-pound giant, had limited Canada's scoring chances, but pinch-hitter Warren Cohen got the rally going early in the inning.

He reached second base on a hit, setting up a nail-biting finish. Cohen came home thanks to a clutch single from the bat of I.J. Shecter.

With the score knotted at two and Schecter at second, Phil Gigan completed the rally with a double off the outfield wall, scoring Shecter.

"It was bedlam," Revin recalled. "The boys were really happy."

Canada East got to the final by riding the strong pitching arm of Vancouverite Murray Margolis, the only non-Torontonian or Montrealer on either team.

He led Canada East to a 4-0 seventh-inning lead, only to see Argentina whittle away at the margin. With the score narrowed to 4-3 and Margolis tiring, Revin pulled the pitcher and brought in Howard Schilling in relief. Shilling struck out the last batter and preserved the win.

The final game was "anti-climactic, "lacking the emotion that characterized both semis, said Revin, a coach's certification instructor for Baseball Canada.

In other events, Canada, led by head coach Joe Amar, shut out Mexico 3-0 to win the bronze medal in mini-football. Amar was assisted by Armand Moryousef and Bradley Kalk.

Canada drew a medal blank in rugby, owing in part to an undermanned team. Only six players made the trip to South America and the Canucks had to "borrow" a couple of Argentine players who had been dropped from the home team.

In golf, Neil Freder shot a 73 in a practice round, but that was the best he could do and he finished out of the medals.

In the half-marathon, Benjamin Serfaty gave it his best shot, but was overcome by dehydration and had to be held back by doctors from finishing the gruelling race.

Canada's second gold medal was earned by Bob Luxenberg, who headed Canada's 56-member contingent.

Luxenberg, who retired from competitive swimming 16 years ago and who admits to "being totally out of shape," was convinced by Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon to enter the 50-metre freestyle event as a senior (35-39).

After some coaxing, Luxenberg relented. In a race that included "masters" and youngsters "with their hair shaved off," Luxenberg won the masters gold and came within three-tenths of a second of winning the overall gold medal.

Luxenberg said the Pan American Maccabi Games brought together about 2,000 athletes from 22 Western hemisphere countries. Canada sent 56 athletes and support staff to the regional event, more than double the 20 who attended the '87 games.

The Pan American Maccabi Games are more of a "celebration of Jews and Jewish youth" than a high level athletic event, Luxenberg said. The calibre of competition is much higher at the Israel games, he added.

The Argentine Maccabi organization had asked their counterparts in the hemisphere to bring as many athletes as possible; so Canada entered two softball teams, Revin said.

Owing to the 1994 terrorist attack that destroyed the Jewish community's AMIA building and killed almost 100 people, security was extremely tight during the competition. Armed escorts accompanied the Canadian team everywhere.

The Argentines gave the games tremendous publicity, with the opening and closing ceremonies carried live on television and broadcast throughout South America, Luxenberg said.

Argentine authorities seemed to want the games to showcase the country and show that it was now safe for visitors to travel to Buenos Aires, Luxenberg said.

During the event, most of the 2,000 visiting athletes and delegates visited the site of the terrorist bombing in downtown Buenos Aires.

"We all lit candles. It was quite emotional," Revin said.

The Canadian team also enjoyed local hospitality at a kabbalat Shabbat service, a tango dance and music show, as well as a tour of sites around Buenos Aires.

Doctors, administrator honored for teaching excellence

TORONTO — Three physicians, as well as the president of North York General Hospital, recently received awards recognizing the hospital's role as a regional teaching hospital.

Family physician Dr. Peter R. Newman was given the 1995 Community Teacher of the Year Award by the Ontario College of Family Physicians. The award is presented for teaching excellence in family medicine and the recipient is chosen by Family Medicine Program residents (who have earned their medical degrees and are continuing to study in a specialty area). The residents noted Newman's enthusiasm for teaching and his being an effective role model for the practice of comprehensive community-based family medicine.

"At North York General, we focus on teaching family medicine outside of hospitals and teaching units. We do most of our teaching in our community-based practices," says Newman, who is an assistant professor with the Department of Family and Community Medicine at the University of Toronto (U of T) and president of the Medical Staff Association and a member of the hospital's board of governors.

Dr. Peter R. Newman

Others honored were Dr. Mark Shaffer, also a family physician at North York General, and Dr. Isser Dubinsky, chief of Emergency Services.

Shaffer was named a Fellow of the Canadian College of Family Physicians, recognized for his leadership role in establishing the North York General Hospital Department of Family Medicine After Hours Clinic in 1988, as well as for his contribution to community-based teaching as an assistant professor with the Department of Family and Community Medicine at U of T.

Dubinsky received the Anna Jarvis Award for Teaching Excellence in Emergency Medicine from the U of T. The recipient is selected by Emergency Medicine residents who consider criteria such as clinical teaching ability, participation in rounds, research supervision and mentorship of professional standards and guidelines. Dubinsky is an assistant professor in the Department of Family and Community Medicine at U of T.

Hospital president and CEO Murray MacKenzie received the Eugenie M. Stuart Award for Merit from the Department of Health Administration, U of T. The award recognizes excellence in teaching in the Master of Health Sciences (Health Administration) Program. In presenting the award to MacKenzie, the university stated: "Your teaching best exemplifies the expertise, innovation and enthusiasm which the award is intended to acknowledge and nurture. These fine qualities ... are recognized and highly regarded by your colleagues and students." Mackenzie is an assistant professor in the Department of Health Administration.

North York General is a regional teaching hospital with 346 acute care and 160 long-term care beds. A member of the Boyd Academy of the University of Toronto Faculty of Medicine, North York General is a clinical teaching site for over 120 undergraduate and post-graduate medical students.

The Award was presented to the star of Crazy for You by Barry Sherman, president of Apotex Inc. and by 100-year-old Baycrest resident Minn Sandler, seen here with Rooney. The Canadian Jewish News classifieds really work!!

Dear Susan,

My 5-year-old son has peanut allergies. Because of this, he does not like to visit other people's houses, particularly when there is a birthday party. Can you give us some strategies for coping with this stress?

Dear Reader,

In assessing this situation, we first need to determine to what extent his behavior is normal and appropriate for his age, and to what degree his anxiety is a result of the allergy.

Four and five year olds typically are at a stage where they are developing their independence, and are torn between wanting to assert this developing independence while still requiring the protection of Mom, particularly in new situations. As a parent you need to acknowledge both aspects of this stage of their development by encouraging their independence while not forcing it on them too quickly. When new situations arise you can encourage your child to express his feelings (especially negative ones), and you can talk your child through his anxiety. On a concrete level, you can help him develop his independence by initially staying with him when he visits, and then slowly removing yourself. It is perfectly normal for children to experience separation anxiety at this age and stage.

In your son's case, the allergy will certainly play a part in his feelings, since outside his home he has less control of his environment. In the instance of birthday parties, you can inform the host of your child's allergy and ensure they understand the dietary limitations that creates. You then could leave your child during play time, and resurface at food time. In order to ground him emotionally. Ultimately you will have to assess the inherent risks in each new situation that arises.

Finally, you might consider how you and your spouse handle anxiety. Are you good role models? As part of this assessment, you should examine how your parents handled anxiety to determine how their coping mechanisms effected your own.

When all is said and done, it is important to be attuned to your child's emotional state, and to ensure that he knows that you will be able to support him in whatever he is experiencing. The more emotionally grounded you are as parents, the less arduous a journey it will be for him.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

Sam Firestone Caterers and Shaarei Shomayim — a family tradition for over thirty years

Sam Firestone's table settings spell "Elegance" with a capital "E"

Sam Firestone Caterers (Glatt Kosher) have been at Shaarei Shomayim for over three decades. Continuing the tradition his father began, Catering Manager Les Firestone is a youthful, energetic man who treats catering as an art form. Every event is a performance where Les aspires to the ultimate in food, decor, entertainment, and all the other aspects of a successful affair.

Certain traits are key in making Sam Firestone Caterers, Leslie and his team such a wonderful organization. You must be easygoing and have the ability to work with all different types of people and their tastes. Leslie always bears his client's goals in mind when making suggestions. Flexibility is the operative word here.

Magnificent presentation is characteristic of a Sam Firestone simcha

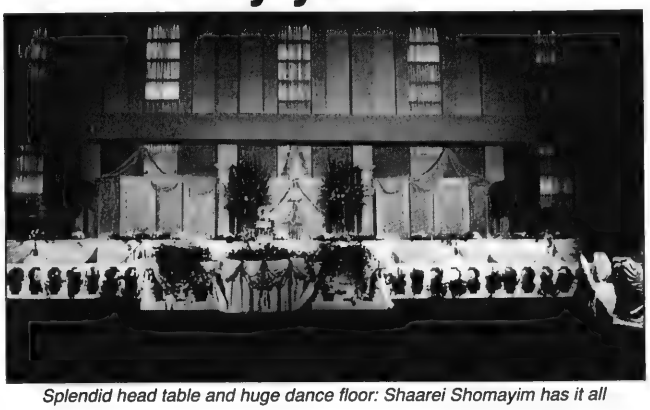
Years of experience, dedication and knowledge allow Leslie to put his customers at ease. He has the right answers to all their questions. Of course, having a keen eye for detail and good organizational skills are two necessary ingredients for success. Finally, integrity is a must; and though the client is king, Les is forthcoming when he disagrees. He considers it his obligation to give the best advice his ability and experience can offer.

Leslie's goal is to make the day of your simcha stress-free. He and his capable staff are on hand — unobtrusively — to ensure everything runs smoothly. Les' philosophy is to make his customers 100% happy, and he will do whatever it takes to achieve this goal.

The main banquet hall at Shaarei Shomayim is spacious and bright. It's the perfect setting for hosting weddings and all kinds of affairs besides: bar and bat mitzvahs, cocktail parties, engagement parties, receptions, sports banquets, tribute dinners and organizational evenings. The large, well-lit foyer is ideal for receptions; for smaller affairs, there are sisterhood and brotherhood halls.

The sanctuary is large, yet intimate, built in a semi-circle like an amphitheatre, so that from any seat you can see the centre easily; there are stages for either a lower or upper chuppah. There is also a well-appointed bride's room; and as of spring 1996, there will be an outdoor chuppah to meet the growing demand for outdoor weddings.

Executive Chef Jimmy Lyras is a culinary genius. He is assisted by a talented team of professionals. His mandate is to make food that is fabulously fresh and made to order the day of the event. From the many compliments he receives, it is obvious he achieves his goal. Jimmy goes the extra distance to ensure customers' satisfaction. Most rave reviews of his meals include adjectives such as "generous", "plentiful", "outstanding", and "delicious": in short, superlatives galore. Not only are portions ample, but the taste and quality of the ingredients are unsurpassed.



Splendid head table and huge dance floor: Shaarei Shomayim has it all

People today pay more attention to the presentation of food; they are also more health-conscious and attentive to methods of preparation. Potatoes and red meat are less popular; pasta, vegetarian dishes, salads, chicken and fish are 'in'. Nevertheless, traditional Eastern European cooking still has loyal followers.

Peoples' culinary tastes are constantly changing. As a result, Jimmy and Leslie will design a menu to meet each customer's specific requirements.

Trying to satisfy all guests is important — even kids. To this end, Leslie offers creative menu ideas for the children attending simchas. Some of the most recent favourites that have been served are chicken and beef fajitas, sweet and sour Oriental chicken, deli buffets, and pasta.

Les Firestone is the exclusive caterer to Shaarei Shomayim. Although all catering is done in-house, non-members are welcome and form an important part of the clientele. As to cost, menus can be customized to individual budgets and tastes; standards are always high, regardless of budget.

Les not only welcomes feedback from clients; he actually seeks it out, giving them questionnaires on which they rate his services. The feedback is overwhelmingly positive, and includes hundreds of thank-you letters from satisfied clients.

Les stays on the premises until the very last customer has left. "I want to experience everything first-hand, and personally respond to any requests," he says. "What does "personal service" mean if you're not there to personally serve?" The bottom line, though, is that he does it "because I love it."

Sam Firestone Caterers is Glatt Kosher, under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.), with a full-time mashgiach on the premises.

Call early to book your wedding or other special event. You can reach Les at (416) 782-8022.

In quality, service and attention to detail, Sam Firestone "takes the cake"

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 200 people, starting at $78 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers free parking for all members of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

The bride and groom may enjoy three complimentary nights at an Inter-Continental hotel in New York, Washington D.C., Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles, or San Francisco. Or, there is the alternative of one free room on the wedding night for every $1,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 75 guests at $78 each, totalling $5,850, there would be five complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $155 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is located at 220 Bloor Street West, just west of Avenue Road, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 960-5200.

Roksolana dresses brides, mothers with equal panache

With a flair for fabric and exactitude of design that has earned her a reputation as one of Toronto's most resourceful dressmakers, Roksolana has become the designer of choice for women seeking a special outfit not only for weddings but also for bar mizvahs, cocktail parties, and other special occasions.

Often characterized by strong neckline treatments that help direct the visual focus towards the wearer's face and away from potential problem areas, Roksolana's work can best be described as customized, tailored fitting with a European flair. Her creations make liberal use of stunning, richly textured imported fabrics that add depth and substance. Pure Italian and French silks, chiffons and other luxurious offerings are the order of the day.

To achieve the classic, elegant look so in demand today, Roksolana embellishes collars and cuffs with delicate embroidery and lace as opposed to heavy beading. "You don't create softness and femininity by throwing in a few more puffs and ruffles," she says. "Rather, you allow them to shine through the garment by conceiving, cutting and fitting it to complement the wearer's figure and personality. That way it's you that looks great — not just the dress."

The garments, like the designer, are versatile: unlike the trendy, gaudy outfits that are worn once and discarded, Roksolana's classic suits and jackets will live to liven up another occasion, perhaps recycled with a new set of fabric-covered buttons. After all, there is life after weddings! Even her brides have been known to show up at a post-wedding affair in their wedding dress and carry it off, attesting to a versatility of style that few other designers can claim.

With approachable prices that belie her lofty styling and attention to detail (wedding gowns start at $900), it's no wonder that Roksolana has become one of Toronto's most sought-after bridal and evening wear designers. Her friendly disposition and easygoing approach to consultations are also valued by her clients, and fit right in to the Bloor West Village environment where her salon is comfortably ensconced. The pleasure of your visit is an inkling of the effusion of praise to follow.

Get swept off your feet in more ways than one.

At Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto, we make any simcha elegantly distinctive and respectfully traditional. Celebrate in one of our elegant reception rooms with up to 250 guests, or under the stars in our outdoor courtyard. And enjoy a special Mazel Tov gift – a complimentary overnight stay for every $1,000 you spend on Food & Beverage.

No need to seek out the extraordinary at Alan Cherry; it'll find you

Guy Laroche for Alan Cherry Bridal: seaside fantasy

As any bride who'se enjoyed the Alan Cherry treatment will tell you, buying a gown from his magnificent bridal salon is an experience that ranks second only to the wedding ceremony itself.

"Everyone talks about royal treatment, but here we treat you even better: like a friend," says Vice-President Maria Arrigo. Thus it is at Alan Cherry that superficial pampering is replaced by personal interest; flattery by honest opinions; salesmanship by informativeness. Indeed, the treatment received by brides from Arrigo, designer Nancy Di Croce and associate Sabrina Corrado has left such an impression on Alan Cherry's customers that these "three amicas" have received countless invitations to attend their clients' weddings, and a flood of letters long after the ceremony.

Dior and Laroche are Alan Cherry exclusives

The warmth you'll encounter at Alan Cherry bridal goes hand in hand with a level of expertise that will ensure you not only of the correct purchase, but also of an impeccable fit and of any enhancements that may heighten the overall impact of the gown. With their trained eyes and vast design experience, Arrigo, Di Croce and Corrado are able to spot shortcomings that other bridal consultants may not, and suggest the necessary improvements.

"At many stores, buying a gown is the end of the line," says Arrigo. "Here, it's just the beginning. We want every bride to leave our shop looking a hundred percent. We will not settle for ninety nine percent."

Backing this perfectionism is a stable of designers that take wedding dresses to new heights. Gowns from the prestigious French houses of Christian Dior and Guy Laroche are both exclusive to Alan Cherry Bridal, as are Carmela Sutera and Helen Morley. And the designers are not here in name only: Alan Cherry Bridal holds regular trunk shows to allow brides to see how their gowns will look "live." Highly-ranked representatives of the designers — or the designers themselves — are always present at these shows. On February 22, 23 and 24, Helen Morley (one of her gowns is pictured at right) will be on hand.

Most bridal shops have at least one gown that will make you swoon, but at Alan Cherry Bridal you'll need the smelling salts to view the entire collection. And that's just how it should be, says Arrigo. "There's too much sameness in the marketplace," she says. "It's not just our aim to offer something different, it's our obligation." In the finest Alan Cherry tradition, each piece is a work of art in its own right.

The frescoed cupola at the centre of the salon ties together an interior so brimming with magnificence that you feel you're in the Louvre as opposed to a bridal salon. The only real difference is that here, the masterpiece you're viewing is you — with a little help from Guy Laroche, Christian Dior, Helen Morley, and other Alan Cherry exclusives. Oversized mirrors are everywhere, and you're encouraged to take advantage of them by trying on "as many gowns as you need to," says Arrigo. (Thankfully, the unwritten "two gown limit" that exists in some stores is absent here). To ensure that the total look their customers seek can be achieved under one roof, Alan Cherry Bridal carries a complete selection of veils, headpieces, shoes, and jewellery. "A great gown without the proper accessories is like a bagel without cream cheese," says Arrigo, perhaps borrowing the analogy from neighbouring Lox, Stock and Bagel. "We will not willingly allow any bride to walk out of here without looking her absolute best," she says.

Clients made to feel at ease

This commitment sometimes involves discouraging a bride from selecting the wrong gown; with the multitude of superb designs offered by the salon, it's easy for a bride to "fall" for a dress that may not be ideally suited for her figure or personality. Under these circumstances, it's imperative that clients avail themselves of the staff's expertise. "Choosing a nice gown is a no-brainer, but choosing the perfect gown means being all eyes and all ears, and having the right people to listen to." If there was such a thing as a Doctorate of Bridal Studies, Mss. Arrigo, Di Croce and Corrado would surely number among that group.

Combining theatrical flair with roguish simplicity, this Guy Laroche creation appeals to the high-spirited woman. Available in Canada only at Alan Cherry Bridal.

Helen Morley for Alan Cherry Bridal: a timeless classic

A tough act to follow

Celebrities have long shopped at Alan Cherry Ladies, and the bridal salon is no exception, numbering among its satisfied customers such luminaries as Phantom Of The Opera star Gay Willis. Anyone with a theatrical flair and an eye for the extraordinary will be gratified by a visit to Alan Cherry Bridal, and the service they'll receive will be a tough act for any shop to follow.

Rare is the salon whose reality can match your visions of a dream dress, but at Alan Cherry Bridal, the vision and the reality are one and the same.

AT RITCHÉ, BRIDES' DREAMS HAVE COME TRUE FOR THREE GENERATIONS

For over 40 years, the Ritché family has been assisting three generations of Canadian brides with the selection and design of their wedding attire. From the beginning, Ritché's motto has been: "Where brides' dreams come true".

Jack Ritché received his fashion training in Europe, then came to Canada. Here, in his first store at Bloor and Avenue Rd., he soon established a reputation as a leading couturier designer – and not only in Toronto. He has outfitted local and national celebrities, as well as thousands of brides across Canada.

Jack's daughter Vivian joined the family business in 1981. Soon after, Ritché expanded, adding the Avenue Road location; today, Vivian and her husband Arthur Prussky operate two successful bridal salons. Meanwhile, Jack Ritché still personally attends to customers, and finds a creative outlet in designing dresses for brides and mothers in fine fabrics and laces from around the world.

The imported and Canadian bridal gown collections feature designers such as Alfred Sung, Mori Lee, Paloma Blanca, Alfred Angelo, Jai International, Moonlight, Mon Cherie, and Jessica McClintock. It is the Ritché Originals and custom design service, though, that set Ritché apart from other bridal salons.

Vivian says her father has always followed the principle that "What the bride wants, the bride gets" – even though it means working harder, going that extra step to get it exactly right. Vivian and her husband still follow this principle; and the thank-you cards and notes they receive prove that it works.

Always, this means close attention to details. "Heaven," says the proverb, "is in the details"; and it's the specifics of fabric, fit and design that make a particular gown best for a particular bride. "For any bride," says Vivian, "there is the dress that's just right." And it's not good enough to be close: only "just right" will do.

Customers vary greatly, from those who know what they want the moment they see it, to those who carefully ponder every detail. Serving the customer to the best of one's ability means offering guidance which is based on decades of knowledge and experience, yet tailored to individual tastes and desires.

Ritché' has one of the largest selections of bridal wear available in Toronto. Brides-to-be can choose from any one of the hundreds of styles in the salon, or have one custom-made to their own desires. There is something here for every bride, for every taste and theme, elegantly simple or opulently elaborate, traditional, contemporary or avant-garde.

Ritché takes pride in pleasing even the customer with very particular tastes. "In fact," says Vivian, "the real test of excellence is the customer with the most discriminating tastes." Often, moreover, those who are hardest to please are the most loyal, and therefore the best long-term source of recommendations to new customers.

Ritché's spacious three-level Avenue Rd. store features an entire floor of wedding dresses. Relaxing in private consultation rooms, brides make their selections with the assistance of friendly, knowledgeable consultants. Meanwhile, mothers, bridesmaids, flower girls and wedding guests can browse through a wide selection of gowns, special-occasion dresses, suits, evening wear, party dresses, and accessories including jewelry and shoes.

For 1996, Ritché is featuring an exclusive European designer collection, using the finest Swiss and Austrian laces and Italian silks. In Canada, this collection will be available only from Ritché. As to the custom design department, it is stronger than ever: "Mr. Ritché just can't stop designing". There is also a sophisticated, stylish spring collection of mother's dresses and suits for wedding and bar mitzvah mothers.

If you are in search of a bargain, visit Ritché's Factory Clearance Store on Richmond St. West at Spadina Ave. Here you will find a large selection of wedding gowns in a wide range of styles and sizes, marked from 20%-70% off retail prices.

For two years in a row, 1994 and 1995, Ritché' has been chosen a Winner in the Toronto Sun Reader's Choice Awards, as Sun readers' favorite bridal salon.

For the major events in your life, choosing and deciding must be allowed plenty of time. As you will want to make repeat visits over several months – not only for the bride's gown, but for the mother's suit, bridesmaids' and flower girls' gowns, and accessories – visit or call Ritché's soon.

Ritché's two locations are: 1662 Avenue Rd., south of 401, (416) 789-4378 (bridal appointments preferred); and 423 Richmond St. West at Spadina Ave., (416) 362-2349 (no appointment necessary).

Bronson's Bridal Registry: Quality, Service, Unbeatable Prices

Bronson's China and Gifts owes its reputation to its huge selection and dedication to service. "This is a customer-oriented store," says owner Ilene Bronsteter, who has been at this spacious Thornhill location for 17 years. "Being customer-oriented is important for any business; but in making new brides feel at ease, it's essential."

Since 1979, thousands of people across Canada have relied on Bronson's for gifts they cherish years after the wedding day. Ilene has built much of her business on referrals from satisfied brides, and looks forward to registering the children of those who registered when Bronson's first opened.

Ilene takes pride in having one of the best bridal registries in Canada. The huge selection offers something to match every budget and taste; and Bronson's pricing policy ensures that everything is offered at the best price. "We help clients pick in the proper range," says Ilene, "and show them how to remain within budget while making tasteful choices. We pride ourselves on always matching another store's prices."

Bronson's experienced bridal consultants spend at least 45 minutes with each bride, helping her pick colors and patterns from the store's selection of quality china, dinnerware, flatware, stemware and giftware. They help co-ordinate new items with those the bride already owns, setting a table to show how the tableware she chooses will look in the new home.

The atmosphere in Bronson's is relaxed, friendly and pressure-free, encouraging customers to look and choose at their leisure. Friendliness extends to the guests of the bride. "Your guests are ours too," says Ilene.

"We've noticed a lot more men coming in," she adds. "The choice of dinnerware is no longer left exclusively to the bride and her mother. The groom wants a voice in these decisions."

Besides traditional patterns from all over the world, Bronson's offers modern and contemporary designs. Among the famous international brand names are Rosenthal, Mikasa, Noritake, Wedgewood, Fitz & Floyd, Villeroy and Boch, and Royal Doulton. Beautiful hand-painted Italian designs are also available.

Conway & Gower tops brides' wish lists

If the clinking of cutlery and the tinkling of glasses are the kinds of sounds that bring happiness to mind — especially that of the dining festivities that accompany a marriage — a visit to Conway & Gower in Hazelton Lanes will give you a jolly good start.

With "everything for the dining room but the food," this busy, bustling showroom is fairly brimming at the seams with fine English and European china, crystal, Irish and French linens, oil paintings, watercolours and prints, to name but a few items. It's the kind of environment that makes bridal registry shopping a pleasure rather than a chore. And if, in the course of shopping for that special wedding gift, you should weaken and decide to stow away something for yourself — no problem! There are so many uniquely different items here that no recipient need play second fiddle.

Antique silver serving dishes — cutlery — Cumbria crystal — fine china by Richard Ginori — every treasure you'd expect and many you wouldn't has a temporary home here pending its delivery to a delighted bride and groom. For as little as $10 or as much as $12,000, Conway and Gower has the perfect gift for anyone's home.

Proprietor Hilary Jones is usually on the premises and has the expertise to advise you on your gift and Bridal Registry purchases. It's refreshing and comforting to receive specific answers to your questions, and her knowledge of every item in the shop is almost encyclopedic. This type of assistance is particularly welcome when designing your wedding list, which is fully computerized to avoid duplication and is held for one year after the wedding and even longer if desired. The registry can be cheerfully amended at any time, even after the wedding day. Brides are kept up to date on the status of the list and are promptly advised if further items should be added.

The atmosphere is extremely low-key, the service warm and personal. Gifts are wrapped, stored and delivered at no extra charge and can be delivered worldwide. To assist out-of-town guests, phone and mail orders are accepted.

Special discount and gifts for bride & groom

As a further enticement for customers seeking a wedding gift, Conway and Gower offers 10% off all pre-wedding registry purchases and they give the couple a gift both on their wedding day and on their first anniversary.

Conway and Gower offers you the missing pieces to any dining-room puzzle, and the ideal solution to the omnipresent question, "What should I get them?!" It's an elegant British dining room, fine china showroom and curio shop all rolled into one, and a sensory delight to visit.

Deblins Linens' bridal bonanza easy on the pocketbook

When you enter the Deblins Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd., the first thing you notice is the variety of color. Pastels, reds, blues, yellows, greens and earth tones form lively, striking contrasts with white and ivory. On the wall, to the left of the entrance, are triple-woven throw blankets with tapestry-like scenes and images in rich golden-browns. The colors and clean fragrance of the fabrics make Deblins a delight to the senses.

It is also a pleasure for the pocketbook. When the Chitiz family opened their Orfus Road store in 1994, they set out to offer maximum quality, variety and service at minimum cost to the customer — or, in President Ellis Chitiz' words, "boutique quality at warehouse prices".

The success of this policy is borne out by the fact that now there are two more stores, one in Thornhill and one in Mississauga. All three stores carry the same quality merchandise at the same low prices. In fact, Deblins' prices are so low they don't even give discounts to designers.

Bustling with activity

The Superstore is always busy with customers and new consignments. This itself is an attraction to shoppers: as Ellis points out, "people like to come into a busy store".

Vigorous, active and always occupied, Ellis enjoys his work. From his office, which commands a view of the store entrance and the cashiers, he keeps his hands on every phase of the business. Within ten minutes, he talks to a shipper, answers a staff member's question, assists a customer, and makes at least one phone call.

Besides a huge selection, Deblins offers quality merchandise exclusively: no irregulars, no seconds. "If you find a better price elsewhere," Ellis urges, "buy it; but nine times out of ten, if you consider price, quality and service together, Deblins' deal is the best."

At a time when people are careful with money, Ellis' policy is generating plenty of repeat business, even among those who comparison shop before buying. Ellis respects these shoppers. He doesn't expect customers to compromise on quality, because he doesn't.

The selection at Deblins is huge. You can buy all your dry goods here, and color co-ordinate them on the spot. There is a wide assortment of ready-made curtains, valances and draperies, chosen to match sheet designs; Deblins also offers a wealth of table linens. Besides tablecloths, there are napkins, napkin rings and table pads, whether for Shabbos dinner or informal meals.

Deblins' sheet selection includes Croscill, Wamsutta, Revman, Crown Craft, Martex, Carrington, Springmaid, Fieldcrest and the Veratex line which is printed in Israel. Their selection also includes a wide array of pillow covers, duvets and duvet covers.

Deblins offers white Canadian goose-down duvets in all weights and sizes at exceptional prices, with a wide range of complementary coverings. There are nine different styles of pillows to complete your bedding ensemble.

The towel selection is equally impressive: Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in 22 solid colors, at rock-bottom prices; Dundee, also in solid colors; Jacquard towels with designs; and Spirella printed towels. To match them, there is a wide range of bathroom accessories: shower curtains, mats, soap dishes, tumblers, toothbrush and backbrush holders, as well as tissue and lotion dispensers.

Deblins ships and takes orders all over the world, yet offers the service you expect from a small store. Customers' questions are answered promptly and expertly, on everything from fabric care to color co-ordination. In the rare instance where you don't find exactly what you need, Deblins will order it, or custom-make it at a good price.

January/February blahs? Not at Deblins!

Among merchants, conventional wisdom says that no one likes to spend in January and February. Come to Deblins, and the bargains may change your mind.

Sheets normally sold for $30 to $40 sell for $10. Drapes usually priced at $130 sell at $30; and valances normally priced at $40 or $60 go for $10. A $120 rod-pocket set for windows sells for $30.

Calvin Klein washcloths, with a standard price of $8, are offered at $1.99. Placemats usually offered at $5 to $10 are going for $2.99. Napkins usually priced between $3 and $6 sell for $1.99.

As to tableware, Deblins offers bargains year-round. In January, a wide selection of lace tablecloths in all sizes is available for $14.99 each; printed tablecloths are selling at half price.

At 10,000 square feet, the Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd. is Deblins' largest location. It is a few minutes north of Lawrence, just west of Dufferin; call (416) 782-2910. The other stores are in the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, (905) 709-0007; and in the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at the corner of Winston Churchill and Dundas, (905) 820-1509. All three locations are open seven days a week.

Regal Kosher Caterers: the ultimate in Glatt Kosher catering and the royal treatment

Every caterer promises three key elements for your simcha's success: quality, selection, and service. At Regal Kosher Caterers, however, catering manager Joanne Katz states in no uncertain terms that "we don't just promise; we deliver."

Splendid simchas for 20 to 1,000 people

Located in the Montecassino Place Hotel at 3710 Chesswood Drive (at Sheppard and the Allen Road), Regal Kosher Caterers can accommodate functions for as few as 20 and as many as 1,000 guests. With a permanent on-site Kosher kitchen and talented chefs, Regal offers superb Middle Eastern, European, Continental and innovative Oriental dishes. "When we offer our clients a range of choices, we do so with the conviction that each menu will be customized and distinctive, with quality and attention to detail," says Joanne.

With pride, she states that working with the clients of Regal Kosher Caterers "is a privilege and a pleasure." Not only does she enjoy contact with people ("the clients are wonderful"), her many years in Kosher catering enable her to provide careful attention to all of the details that will make your celebration very special.

The principals of Regal — Joe Elmaleh, C.A., Irwin Diamond, and Rabbi A. J. Eisenberger — have entrusted Joanne with full authority in the catering department. Her rapport with staff and clients has created an environment which is successful and supportive. Many of the bookings are from those who have used Regal's services before, and from referrals from many satisfied clients.

Toronto's only Kosher caterer with a full-service Glatt Kosher restaurant on the premises

Regal Kosher Caterers also operates King Solomon's Table, a fine-dining, full service Glatt Kosher restaurant on the premises, as well as the Wok 'N Deli, located in Spring Farm Marketplace, 441 Clark Avenue West. Both restaurants are also available for smaller functions like business lunches and private parties. No party is too small. Each location offers ample free parking.

Even better, you can enjoy all of this delicious fare at your place or theirs. A quick phone call to King Solomon's Table or the Wok 'N Deli is all it takes to have almost any item on their menu piping hot and ready to grace your dining table.

For all celebrations — weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, sheva brouches, graduations, in short, any special occasion — Regal Kosher Caterers will make your event worry-free and memorable.

To book your wedding or other special function, call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303.

Regal Kosher Caterers will make your celebration very special

Naturally, you want your simcha to be perfect. The recipe for a perfect celebration is to have it all made so easy with the co-ordination talents of the team at Regal Kosher Caterers. Catering Manager Joanne Katz, with the experience of so many successful functions under her belt, has a host of satisfied customers who'll tell you their simchas were "better than perfect" — what they wanted, when they wanted it, delivered with patience, pizzazz and true caring. If Joanne and Regal Kosher Caterers can't do it, it probably can't be done.

Regal Kosher Caterers offers superb cuisine under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.). For your everyday dining, a full-service Glatt Kosher restaurant (King Solomon's Table) is located right on the premises. King Solomon's Table is now open every Saturday evening for your dining pleasure (one hour after Shabbos), and is available for your smaller private parties (up to 120 people) on Sunday morning/afternoon.

Can you improve on perfection? At Regal Kosher Caterers, we are always trying to find out. Call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303 and start your simcha ball rolling.

True artistry separates Lavee from run-of-the-mill

The painter sets about his task with canvas and pigments, the photographer with camera and lenses. Figuratively speaking, Joe Lavee can be said to do a bit of both.

In mood, composition, and lighting, Lavee's work is a world apart from the majority of commercial photographers. Each painstakingly composed piece reveals the fruits of his twenty years of master craftsmanship.

With an altogether natural style that blends the haunting emotiveness of classical photography with the refreshing frankness of the contemporary school, Lavee's work evokes the kind of emotions one normally experiences in the AGO or the National Gallery. Captured in repose (a couple quietly embracing), his subjects glow with an energy reminiscent of Lauren Harris; or, exuding joy (a son hugging his father), leap from the "canvas" with glee.

Modestly, Lavee sees himself more as a medium than a messenger. "I am here to tell the story of the day by translating the emotions and feelings that are already present," he says. "I am not here to add to them or detract from them, nor am I here merely to identify people, like in a catalogue." To facilitate his role of photographer-cum-historian, Lavee helps his subjects to be themselves by encouraging them to make eye contact – the first step in allowing the emotions to flow freely – through gentle coaxing in his soft, almost hypnotic voice.

"I don't create these things, he says; I just know which buttons to push." Those who enjoy his services are often amazed at just how accurately his finger has measured the pulse of the situations he records. For the bride and groom, employing his services is an assurance not only of quality, but of the kind of artistic excellence that makes subjects come to life. Lavee's prices are slightly above average, but when relatives and friends gather to peruse the fruits of his labours, they see not just another wedding or bar mitzvah album, but a vibrant pictorial that will make the emotions of the day come rushing back.

Transcending the solid and highly presentable work of many of his contemporaries, Lavee "paints" his subjects with light and shadow. If the snap-happy set represents one end of the photographic scale, then Lavee's work represents the other end. "For me, pushing a shutter is serious business," he says, "and not an act to be taken lightly." Eschewing the modern tendency to overshoot in the hopes of lucking into a winner, Lavee maintains that "it's better to have one great shot than ten average ones."

Lavee's customers are invariably gratified to have that "one great shot" grace their albums many times over.

King Edward's restored grandeur, Kosher cuisine make compelling wedding combination

As symbol of stately opulence since 1902, the King Edward Hotel has recently enjoyed a complete renovation which makes the grand old place look as new as on opening day. Now, some 100 years later, you can celebrate your personal milestones on the same hallowed premises with an important advantage: Kosher cuisine.

As you enter the foyer with its tall marble pillars, your eyes are drawn up past the second floor to the skylight high above; then you are attracted to what is closer at hand. Grandeur sometimes makes you want to stand back; here, it invites you in.

In the painting of King Edward on the wall opposite the entrance, the colors are as vivid as the day they were painted. The baroque plasterwork, too, looks as fresh as the day the last touch was added. Dispersed around the lobby are comfortable chairs and sofas enticing you to relax, close enough for conversation but with room to stretch your legs.

Would you assume that in such a setting, a wedding would be prohibitively expensive? Not so, says Catering Manager Fernando Teixeira. "Package prices," he explains, "are geared to the budgets and tastes of our clients." There is something for those of modest means, as well as those on a medium or lavish budget.

Whatever your budget, the quality of cuisine and service is royal. Every wedding at the King Edward includes: a luxurious suite for the bridal couple, with a bottle of special champagne; a printed menu at each place setting; White Glove Service; menu tasting; reduced room rates for your guests; and other amenities.

Special packages may also include floor-length table linens, complimentary coat check, complimentary overnight accommodation for your parents, and other perks.

For Kosher events, the Hotel provides bar and wait staff; the caterer provides food, cutlery and dishes. Exclusive Kosher caterer to the King Edward is GMB Culinary Productions, Glatt Kosher under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.).

GMB was hand-picked by the King Edward with a view to providing their customers with the ultimate in kosher cuisine. Whatever the style or geographic origin of cuisine you select, you can be sure that the quality and presentation will conform to the King Edward's lofty standards. Fernando or a member of his staff will assist you personally in designing the simcha menu that best suits your tastes and budget.

For a larger wedding, the Vanity Fair Ballroom seats 350, or 300 with dancing. Its chandeliers, with their tiny points of diffused brightness, combine old-fashioned crystal charm with the ambience of indirect lighting. The Vanity Fair reception area, with its widely-spaced, comfortable chairs and tall plants, offers a fine view of the main foyer.

For smaller affairs, the Windsor Room seats 200 for dinner, or 150 with dancing. With no adjoining function rooms and less direct access to other parts of the hotel, the Windsor offers more privacy; it's ideal for children, who will not disturb other patrons if they get a little rambunctious. You may also have the ceremony in the Windsor, then move upstairs to the Vanity Fair for dinner and dance.

The King Edward hosts all types of events, from weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs to business luncheons. There are smaller function rooms for ten to 50 people; but no matter how large or small your affair, the level of service matches the ambience.

The King Edward will recommend or book florists, photographers, videographers and bands, and their referrals carry the weight of their own reputation.

One final point of interest: How many hotels offer you a spa? The King Edward is the home of the Nouvelle Maria Spa and Salon, an oasis of calm amid the city's clamour. Fresh flowers, soft music and hushed voices insulate you from the madding crowd. There are separate whirlpool, sauna and lounge facilities for men and women; you can even order lunch.

The Nouvelle Maria stresses health, rejuvenation and beauty, combining European refinement with the wisdom of healthy diet and regular exercise, in programs tailored to your individual needs and desires. Services range from manicures to herbal wraps and massages; there are packages for single visits.

Almost everyone has heard of "the King Eddy"; by holding your simcha there, you place your personal signature on this venerable Toronto landmark.

The restored grandeur of the King Edward Hotel makes a compelling site for your wedding, offering Kosher catering and a myriad of other services.

Mr. Disc Jockey: Seamless entertainment

Forget the guy with the rumpled jacket and a box of tapes. Forget the wisecracking MC with the old jokes. You and your guests deserve the best possible treatment from the people organizing the entertainment at your wedding or other special event; and Mr. Disc Jockey is there to make sure you get only the best.

Mr. Disc Jockey is more than someone to play music and introduce the band. It is an entertainment co-ordinating service, involving everything from music to floor plan. In some ways, owner Ed McMurtry says, entertainment co-ordinating is like catering. Good food — or in this case, good music — is necessary; but it's not enough. For the guests to enjoy themselves, the presentation must show style, grace and creativity.

This is especially the case when you celebrate a milestone event. A wedding, says McMurtry, is an important step in life to be treated with respect, elegance, and dignity. McMurtry and his team wear tuxedos and black ties; and they work in front of their equipment, not behind it. Mr. Disc Jockey is on display, as much as any of the entertainers are, and ready to be judged by appearances.

Mr. Disc Jockey's equipment is high-quality and state-of-the-art, and needs minimal attention. Time is saved by using CD's rather than tapes. In this way a requested song can be found in seconds. This flexibility ensures that all of your entertainment runs smoothy and on schedule.

Ambient sound level is an important part of the atmosphere at a special event. Mr. Disc Jockey's sound is big, pervades the room without being loud, and can feed into a house sound system at low volume for ambient effect.

McMurtry devotes the same attention to lighting, staging and decor, as he does to music and sound. He makes great use of perimeter lighting, which often tends to create a friendlier ambience than overhead lights; and he has the equipment for special effects like pin-spotting tables.

"Heaven is in the details," says the proverb; and it isn't good enough for one or two things to be done well, the rest just OK. The overall feeling has to be perfect. Mr. Disc Jockey presents what McMurtry calls "seamless entertainment". To this end, he and his people even do vocal practice and rehearsals once a month.

McMurtry works closely with bands and other entertainers; for example, he takes care not to play songs the live musicians have on their repertoire. Often, though, after a break, he will start a song on a CD which the band will then come in on as they return to the stage. "This gives the impression," he explains, "that I'm part of the band."

He also enjoys interactive work with the guests, who often have more fun if they have some input. "One can be interactive," he points out, "and still be dignified. We know how to deal with unexpected things like repartee, and weave them into the flow of events."

If the bride and groom want, McMurtry and his team will personally introduce themselves to the guests, to get song requests; or, if the bride and groom prefer, they simply put request cards on the table for guests to fill out.

McMurtry has 16 years' experience in entertainment co-ordination; 6 of those years are full-time. Over the years, Mr. Disc Jockey has grown and expanded, and has built a solid reputation for successful bar mitzvahs and weddings.

Mr. Disc Jockey has done plenty of corporate entertainment co-ordinating as well — including the Prudential Life Insurance convention in 1993, which lasted 7 weeks. They have also co-ordinated for a national marketing managers' function for Today's Bride in 1993, and a game show for the World Series.

Mr. Disc Jockey now does shows across Canada and the U.S., and is ready to travel with a production company. This international experience is starting to be a selling point for the company, which is backed by its own professional production team, Edwin Allen Productions.

Two weeks before the wedding, McMurtry gets from the bride and groom every detail of the wedding: how they will enter the room; whether they will dance the first dance by themselves; etc. Besides making sure everything runs smoothly for bride, groom and guests, McMurtry's meticulous attention to detail makes things easy for the party organizer.

"We do the impossible every day," McMurtry smiles. "Miracles take more advance notice." For bookings call: (905) 737-8670!

Beverly Hills Caterers puts an irresistible offer on Le Parc's table

When an irresistible force (Beverly Hills Caterers) meets an immovable object (Le Parc) and both happen to be travelling in the same direction (terrific simchas), the result is great catering at an irresistible price. Buoyed by the success of their introductory offer of $65 a plate (plus taxes and gratuity, minimum125 people), Raphy Amar of Beverly Hills Caterers and John Verdone of Le Parc have decided not only to extend the offer, but to lower it to $55 on weekdays, when their banquet halls are more readily available.

If you think you've died and gone to heaven, wait until you see the premises and taste the food! Each of Le Parc's five splendid banquet halls is equipped with its own private bar, piano, and foyer. There you'll be treated to a full five-course meal (including open bar and sweet table) that is guaranteed to take its rightful place in your own personal dining "Hall of Fame."

Of course, you are by no means restricted to the promotion; Raphy will be happy to design your own menu for you and will offer you a mind-boggling selection of traditional, Italian, Chinese, Mediterranean, Middle Eastern and West Coast specialties. From a culinary standpoint, he's the consummate perfectionist, a trait that served him well during a ten-year stint as the exclusive kosher caterer to Beth Jacob Synagogue, Los Angeles' largest orthodox congregation. Hosting many gala affairs and theme parties involving the "who's who" of Hollywood has allowed him to attain a level of "hands-on" expertise in simcha planning that is unparalleled in the industry.

Raphy is a Shomer Shabbos caterer and can meet any requirements, including Lubavitch Schechita. Mechitsas can be arranged on request.

At $65 a plate ($55 on weekdays), elegant glatt kosher dining at Le Parc is well within reach

Under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.), Le Parc's new kosher kitchen not only conforms to the highest standards of Kashruth but also boasts state-of-the art food preparation facilities and equipment that allow it to serve from 200 to 2,000 guests with equal ease. Le Parc has become Toronto's favourite spot for large corporate and organizational kosher functions.

Though Raphy's reputation precedes him, customers who deal with him for the first time are invariably impressed by his sincerity, thoroughness and dedication to his craft. Raphy excels in all areas of food preparation and presentation, but he is perhaps best known for his innovations in light, California-style cuisine and his sweet tables, where his Picasso-esque talent for fruit carving is much in evidence (see photo at left).

Major bridal show Jan. 30

As part of its ongoing commitment to superb simchas, Le Parc is hosting the ever-popular "We're Having a Party" bridal show on Tuesday January 30 from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. (see advertisement on page 12 of this section). Bridal gowns — florists — bands — everything you need to make your event click will be under one roof at Le Parc, and admission is free.

The offer currently put on the table by Beverly Hills Caterers and Le Parc ($55 a plate weekdays, $65 weekends) is a compelling opportunity to have your simcha at Toronto's premier banquet and catering facility. "The first thing I wanted to do when I came here," says Raphy, "was to debunk the myth that Le Parc was not affordable. It's amazing how many people were under the impression that you couldn't have an affair here for less than $100 a plate." In order to dispel such notions, he felt he not only had to lower that figure but "smash it to smithereens."

With a volume of business that has grown exponentially since Raphy's arrival, the Beverly Hills / Le Parc formula is clearly working. It's a marriage made in kosher catering heaven. If your marriage is made in heaven too, Raphy will be happy to look after the kosher catering.

Let Pillow Talk outfit the bridal suite in your new home

Joanne Melegou opened Pillow Talk on December 16, 1995 after planning it for 10 years.

During that time she worked in the linen retail trade gathering knowledge and experience. Since opening day, she's been too busy to take more than the shortest time out; but she loves every minute of it.

Joanne exemplifies the truth that a successful retailer has to enjoy dealing with people. "I like to help a young couple," she smiles, "to finish their place with a fine bed, linens and accessories — without having to spend a fortune. Just give me a brief description of your bedroom, and I will help you make it beautiful."

Pillow Talk sells beds and bedding, cushions and pillows, towels and other bathroom linens, gift items, and a plethora of accessories. Here is the place to go to outfit the bridal suite in your new home. While you are here, register with Pillow Talk's Bridal Registry and let Joanne help you co-ordinate bathroom linen, bed linen, accessories, even your bed itself.

Joanne's approach to merchandising is tried and true: she appeals to the consumer who wants both quality and good price. Today, you have to take more care with your money, making every dollar go as far and last as long as possible and at the same time, tastes are more sophisticated and quality-conscious. In this economic and social climate, Pillow Talk's approach is bound to succeed.

Pillow Talk has 2,150 sq. f. of space, filled with quality merchandise. The lines of linen for sale include Fieldcrest, Wamsutta, Springmaid, Revelle, Burlington — and the Sheridan line from Australia, which Joanne is especially proud to be carrying on her shelves.

Not yet well known in Canada, Sheridan bedroom and accessory linens have been on the market elsewhere for 20 years, and earned a solid reputation in over 40 countries. Sheridan's designers and craftspeople are not content to be merely good: every design which emerges from their atelier must embody uncompromising excellence, and undergo rigorous reviews before becoming part of a collection.

One Sheridan design may be a riot of hot pink, rich red and gold that evokes the lush opulence of Imperial India. Another, in simple minimalist lines and monochrome tones, may reflect the austere balance and purity of a Balinese woodblock print. Yet, as great as the variety is, each design is perfectly integrated with the fabric.

Among the major Sheridan creations is the Chateau line. Characterized by refined, classic elegance, Chateau is inspired by architectural embellishments and monumental motifs. Your home is your palace; come home to Sheridan, and let Chateau give courtly cachet to any room.

There are beds galore, including wrought-iron beds by Kessler, with finishes developed to co-ordinate with a broad cross-section of their other furniture. Among these attractive finishes are Rust, Textured Black, and Cyprus, which is a deep green. Kessler also makes accessories, such as an elegant desk rack.

Then there are brass and iron beds by Wesley Allen, manufacturers of the best beds in North America. Each Wesley Allen masterpiece is created in a hand-crafted process, designed to produce a uniquely individual product according to your desire, with finishes customized as you wish them.

Wesley Allen's iron beds are available in a wide variety of painted finishes. Brass beds are available in polished satin, antique or patina brass finish, as well as custom finishes which enhance the uniqueness of your bed, and can be personalized with porcelain or brass finials, polished brass spinnings, elbows and castings.

Then there are the Montaage accent pieces, ranging from towel holders to disc chimes: honest, hand-crafted pieces of work recreating classic old-world motifs in hand-forged iron, hammered molds, hewn wood, fired clays, mouth-blown glass and centuries-old finishing techniques. Let these creative objects define space in your home

Joanne discounts 20-30% from the manufacturers' suggested retail prices — and she does this year-round. You won't find huge seasonal discounts; but you won't find seasonal mark-ups either. Whatever time of the year you come to Pillow Talk, you know you will find quality merchandise at a steady, reliable rate of discount.

"There's less profit per individual item sold," Joanne explains; "but besides more turnover, there's a chance to build customer loyalty and earn repeat business. Everything in Pillow Talk is high quality; and everything is brand-new. When word gets around, people will start coming back for more."

Pillow Talk is located at 180 Steeles Ave. West, just west of Yonge; hours are Mon.-Fri.10-9, Sat. 10-6, and Sun. 12-5. For information call (905) 707-7388.

Clients rave about Stuart Moscoe Photography

"Professional, organized, calm, sensitive, kind. These are the qualities we wanted in a photographer for our daughter's wedding. In selecting Stuart Moscoe, all the qualities we had hoped for materialized into relaxed photo sessions and a huge choice of proofs of the posed and candid shots, resulting in an outstanding album."

— Stan & Sue Freedman

"We get raves for the pictures Stuart did for our son's wedding. Everybody loves them, and they ask who the photographer is."

Heirloom quality of Stavros suits sought out by savvy clientele

Hand-made tailored suits are an endangered species, says Stavros Theodoropoulos, a master tailor trained in Europe.

Most European-trained master tailors are in their fifties and sixties and there are no young people to replace these artisans, he explains.

Stavros, as he is known, has been outfitting celebrities and business executives with hand-made-to-measure suits for more than 40 years. His clients come from as far away as England and San Francisco for his quality and craftsmanship.

Pictures of some of his most famous clients — Jerry Lewis, King Constantine of Greece and Mr. T — hang discreetly in his shop, Stavros Master Tailor & Shirtmaker, located at 95 Cumberland St. in the heart of Yorkville.

The newly renovated premises emanate luxury with their mahogany cabinets and handwoven Chinese rugs. Hundreds of bolts of cloth from the finest mills of Italy and England sit in the display cabinets, offering clients a huge selection.

Stavros says today's mass-production techniques for manufacturing suits can't duplicate the quality and detailing of the hand-made product. Each button hole is sewn by hand, and the breast pockets are angled so the pattern of the material can be matched vertically and horizontally. Surgeon's cuffs are used throughout; the buttons actually open and close, unlike those on the cuffs of off-the-rack jackets, which are merely decorative.

It takes 32 hours to make a Stavros suit, 90 percent of which is hand-sewn. The tailors — the youngest is 55 — are all specialists; one does lapels, another does the pockets, and a third does the button holes.

These suits are cut from individualized paper patterns which follow the body's shape. They are more flattering than loose- or ill-fitting factory-made jackets, says Stavros: "they fit like a glove."

Discerning men the world over shop Stavros — especially those with an eye for fashion and a sense of humour

The outer cloth of a Stavros suit is hand-cut and stitched onto a canvas foundation in the shoulders and the front torso which holds the shape of the suit. "The foundation of the suit is like the foundation of a house. Without the canvas, the suit bags and sags." Many ready-made suits have glued-on synthetic foundations which disintegrate with dry cleaning, Stavros adds.

The custom-made suit is a dying art, Stavros laments. "When the master tailors of my generation retire, these fine suits will no longer be available." Thankfully for his customers, Stavros is showing no signs of slowing down yet.

Whether you're a custom couture veteran or are having a gown custom made for the first time, Carol will soon make you feel at home. "I earn a living at what I love," smiles Carol: "creating fine garments; and working with people. You have to love both."

After the initial consultation, Carol develops a style and cut to suit you, in accordance with your budget and the garment's ability to carry to another occasion and/or season. In the '90's, this is a must for many clients.

The wedding dress is created from fabrics such as brocade, lace, satin and silk crêpe; touches of trim, piping and beading make each gown unique. Carol works with traditional or contemporary designs for all types of figures, from petite to large.

"Recently," she says, "I have been doing a lot of work for Orthodox women whose garments must meet strict standards of propriety. I create gowns and dresses which meet these standards, and are fashionable at the same time, for weddings or other special occasions."

Carol studied Fashion Design at Ellen Peterson Institute, and Commercial Design at George Brown College. The strongest testimony to her skills, however, is that most of Studio A's business comes from referrals. "This," she says, "tells me I have done my job well. This is the satisfaction I work for."

Carol will design and fit every dress worn at a wedding, for the bride, mother of the bride, bridesmaids, flower girls, and guests. She also designs business wear and daywear; and if you have rush work, you'll appreciate her timeliness.

Watch for Studio A at the National Bridal Show (Exhibition Place, Automotive Building, Feb. 9-11, in the Couture Fashion Show and the "Beauty and the Beast" Wedding Gown Finale.

Signature Photography: your portrait, your image

Greg Dean of Signature Photography has 10 years' experience working with well-known photographers. Although new, Signature is doing well and Dean's solid reputation is earning him many referrals.

A member of the Board of Professional Photographers of Ontario, Dean is also chairman of the Central Portrait Division. He is a member of Professional Photographers of Canada and Professional Photographers of America, and has won several portrait awards.

He has learned most, Dean says, from clients and other photographers. He learnt a traditional style from Al Gilbert; Dean Macdonnell taught him a more modern style, and a great deal about candid photography.

His personal style synthesizes these men's teachings with his own interest in fashion. He specializes in candid photography, and lectures on it at Humber College. In capturing a particular moment and expression, he says, candids are much like portraits.

Dean's approach to photography is casual and informal. He "goes with the flow," stays unobtrusive, and lets the client make the decisions. Especially at weddings, which can be stressful because you have to get along with people in large numbers, he values his ability to be patient.

About 50% of Dean's work is wedding and engagement portraits. At weddings, he unites casualness with speed, so as not to occupy the guests for too long; they usually do not want to spend much time being photographed. As to candid wedding shots, fun and a pleasant working atmosphere provide ample opportunities.

Many of his portraits are environmental, or set in landscapes. His shot of a man on a Harley-Davidson at the Bathurst St. bridge won international awards. Another environmental portrait, "New York, New York", has a cityscape at sunset as background. Dean also enjoys photographing at Vaughan Estates, amid the elegant stone buildings with their slate roofs. Another shot shows someone on a cottage pier at sunset, silhouetted against light reflecting off the water.

Always, Dean will try to get something typical of you, the subject, capturing your self-image. For this reason, he likes to photograph people dressed for their own pleasure, in settings where they feel they belong. Usually, he says, this involves casual dress — but with exceptions: many people's self-image includes a tux or gown.

"Book early," Dean advises, "especially for a big affair like a wedding; the bigger, the earlier."

In February, Dean will move Signature from Newmarket to the Yonge-Steeles area. Until then, he is making "house calls," seeing clients in their homes. For your "house call", telephone Greg Dean of Signature Photography, (416) 399-1967.

Custom-made gowns a Tomè specialty

Tomè was thrilled when National Bridal Show asked him to design a wedding gown for Belle of Beauty and the Beast: Only a small group of designers were chosen for the project, he says.

Tomè's design for Belle's gown will be modelled at the grand finale of the wedding show which will be held at the Automotive Building at the Ex. Feb.9-11. Tomè will also have a booth there.

He is the owner of the custom-made womenswear boutique that bears his name, Tomè's, nestled in the enclave of fashionable shops on Avenue Road between Lawrence and Wilson in Toronto.

"I always loved the area. It has a European atmosphere with all these specialty stores," Tomè says. His boutique certainly has a European feel. The garments are made from the finest European cloths and his three seamstresses are European-trained.

Tomè prefers creating custom-made designs, he says. "It's more creative. Every outfit is one of a kind. Custom-made is great for women with hard-to-fit shapes like women who are Size 10 on top and 14 on the bottom."

Tomè offers day and evening wear. He outfits many people for bar and bat mitzvahs, creating suits for the morning services and the dresses for the evening.

Tomè's specialty is bridal-wear. He often works with the entire wedding party from the bride and bridesmaids to the mothers of the bride and groom.

He creates slimming outfits for the mothers with four ply silk crepe, he says. "It doesn't stick or puff. It camoflages the body beautifully."

Brides generally come to him because they want to wear something different, he says. "They complain that the ready-made wedding dresses all look the same."

"This is a chance for the bride to create her own look that will also capture her personality. She gets a great selection from fabric to styling to beading. And it's a perfect fit."

The gowns are always made from silks – georgette, crepe, taffeta or satin – imported from Italy or France. Victorian-style gowns with full skirts, fitted torsos, lace and sprinkles of pearls are very popular, says Tomè. "The hand-made roses and finishings and the longer and fuller trains give these gowns a couture look.

Working with brides is very satisfying, he adds. "They're so excited about their gowns. They get to see it created step by step. And they get to give their input down to the last detail. Even the beading is done on the premises."

The Fashion Studio and Salon: expert hair, makeup, photography and more under one roof

Fabulous hairstyling and much more at The Fashion Studio and Salon

Finding the right hairstylist can be a job in itself, to say nothing of the right makeup artist and aesthetician. Ditto for finding the right photographer.

Finding them all under one roof? Forget it — unless you happen to be Janet Bortolussi and Gordon Theo and you've not only developed such a concept but implemented it so well that last September, after three years in business, you moved into spanking new quarters in the Dufferin/401 area with about five times the space (5,500 square feet) of your original location.

What makes this concept work is the fact that the same professional creative team that masterminds the photography shoots is available to you exclusively through the Salon, which offers complete hair services, makeup artistry, bridal consultations, nails, full aesthetics and make-up workshops. Indeed, there is almost no wedding-related service that the Fashion Studio and Salon doesn't offer.

From a photographic standpoint, the Commercial Studio specializes in fashion and glamour photography and offers model portfolios, actor's head shots, business portraits and glamour make-over photo sessions — the real thing, not the gimmicky variety. The Portrait Division offers unique wedding coverage, achieving a perfect balance between the fashion and romance of the contemporary look and the timeless elegance of classical portraiture.

With many years of combined experience in the fashion and beauty industries (Bortolussi) and in wedding and portrait photography (Theo), the partners recognized the logic in making these complementary services — usually available together only on a film set — accessible to the general public. What better time to be photographed than right after you've had your hair and makeup done by a team of professionals who are involved in photo shoots on a daily basis and therefore understand that the camera needs to love your face as much as your friends and family do?

From the elegant pool table (red felt no less!) and the cappuccino bar that greet you in the reception area to the immaculate rooms dedicated to hair, makeup, and aesthetics, it's an altogether captivating environment that melts away your pre-wedding jitters like the sun on spring snow. And you ask yourself: who needs four-appointments-a-day-craziness when everything you need is available here under one roof?

A combination of services usually available together only on a film set are here under one roof

In addition to their impressive credentials, the Fashion Studio's team of professionals is warm and friendly. They know and understand the pressures leading up to your wedding day, and the importance of making you feel relaxed.

Further enhancing the experience is the availability of Koz-me/tiks STUDIO LINE, the Fashion Studio's own exclusive line of cosmetics, totally hypoallergenic and not animal tested.

"We are the image business" is The Fashion Studio's motto; it's refreshing to discover that their own image is more than skin deep.

Perfection at affordable prices

Questions you should ask when booking a videographer:

How long has he been in business? Is this his full-time profession? Will he use the latest equipment? Does he have his own professional editing suite? Does he have spare equipment in case of breakdowns? Will he keep his lighting equipment to a minimum? Can he keep the camera steady so the video will not be shaky, or must he achieve steadiness by keeping the camera on a tripod away from the action? Does he realize that sound is as important as video? Does he have reliable wireless microphones? Will he not interfere with you or your guests? Will he do exactly what you want? Is he reliable? Is he creative? Does he have a friendly personality? Will he be well-groomed and well-dressed? Does he guarantee his work?

At Video Affairs, the answer to all these questions is yes, which is why Video Affairs has become a leader in wedding video production.

With ABC Productions, the client is the star

In the field of wedding video-graphy, Zoran Karapancev of ABC Productions has plenty to be proud of. In Orlando, Fla., in July 1995, against stiff competition from around the world, ABC won the prestigious International Award for Wedding Videography. Not only were over 2,000 videographers there in person; about 500 tapes had been sent in from Japan, Korea, Europe and the United Kingdom.

In the 5 years since the first Wedding Video Expo was held, ABC is the only Canadian company to win an award of this magnitude. In a relatively new field, moreover, ABC Productions' excellence has some history. ABC has been in business for 15 years, and received its first award in 1983, several years before wedding videography had a large public.

ABC tailors the video to the client's needs. "The client," states Zoran, "is fully involved at every stage, from beginning to end." This is the only way, he explains, to guarantee that the needs and wishes of the "stars" of the video can be made real; and while it entails a little more work, the result is worth it.

Zoran takes pride in his ability to evoke clients' feedback, to draw them out so he is sure exactly what they want. For a good video, this input is a must; for while he is producing it, the client is both starring and writing the script. Zoran also considers it his responsibility to give the best advice possible — even though, as clients ultimately make the decisions, they have the right to accept or reject his ideas as they choose.

ABC makes everyone's video different; Zoran's approach to his work is that of an artist, who wants everything from his studio to be unique. At the same time, each video must reflect the personalities of the clients; as much pride as Zoran takes in his work, his abilities are at their service. It is they whom he must please, not himself.

An ABC video, Zoran says, is "more like a movie", where fine camera work and editing are the rule. ABC uses new editing techniques and state-of-the-art equipment and technology, which are of broadcast calibre. His cameras are sensitive enough that with no lights besides those normally in a room, he produces work of feature-film quality.

Besides weddings, Zoran has up-to-date broadcast experience: he shoots and edits for TV stations (videos only). Broadcast media today accept only the highest audio and visual quality; Zoran creates his wedding videos to meet this standard.

He emphasizes, however, that the technology is not there for its own sake. He enjoys using custom-made animation and digital effects at the appropriate times; but to have impact, "special effects must be limited to special moments".

Nor is this just a matter of the novelty wearing thin from seeing something too often. People are, to be sure, more visually sophisticated than they were 10, even 5 years ago; and special effects must work well esthetically in order to impress today's audience; but these are not the main issues.

As much fun as a wedding is, it is also a serious moment, a point of great decision in the lives of the participants. As such, it deserves to be treated with dignity — which is only possible if the making of each wedding video is treated like the creation of a work of art. A wedding video should be timeless: bride, groom and family should be able to replay it years or decades later, and be proud of it. The videographer's work is to bring out the best moments, in a way that will be cherished forever after.

"There are no packages," says Zoran: "everything is a la carte. Or, to put in another way, the client creates his or her own package." Amandalina's ascent to the top of brides' "short list" not long in coming Enjoying an early success far exceeding what might be expected from a new bridal salon, Amandalina's has seen its appointment book swell admirably since its June opening. Says Sam Pollari, who founded the shop with his wife Rachelle, "we've been pleasantly surprised to find ourselves on many brides' "short list" of salons to visit."

Both seasoned veterans of the bridal business, Sam and Rachelle have seen their efforts rewarded by a steady influx of brides captivated by a new twist in bridal gown shopping: "appointment only" service available without an appointment.

The concept sprang from the conviction that today's bride wants the comfort and selection of a state-of-the art salon without the perception of all-or-nothing pressure that sometimes accompanies shopping by appointment. (For those who are more comfortable making an appointment, evenings and Saturdays are preferred). In a castle-like environment that will make romanticists feel right at home, Amandalina's offers a selection of the finest names in bridal attire that will also satisfy even the most rigorous pragmatists.

Weddings, however, are still about love, and love is about romance — a theme underlined in Amandalina's bridal brochure, available for the asking. Each page features a romantic gown accompanied by a charming epithet about the virtues of love. A couple of these gems are reprinted here.

The 1,500 square foot mezzanine-level showroom, accessed via a semi-spiral staircase, ushers you into a world apart. The selection is endless, the sklylit ambience breathtaking. Free as a bird, you'll flit from gown to gown, eventually alighting on the one of your choice. Between flights, you'll take a breather and relax on one of the exquisite leather sofas or lounge chairs. When you're ready to try something on, the deliciously spacious dressing rooms will afford you ample comfort. From the cream-and-salmon decor to the seashell-shaped tables, no pains have been spared to ensure that your visit to Amandalina's will be a pleasant one.

On the main floor, even larger at 2,800 square feet, you'll find a tasteful collection of suits and cocktail dresses for the mother-of-the bride. Indeed, Amandalina's has catered to so many mothers since opening that many mother-and-daughter teams are now addressing their dual needs in the same visit. Mothers who don't want to look like mothers are extremely gratified at Amandalina's compelling selection of suits and evening gowns. Crêpe and chiffon suits, dresses with shadow embroidery that creates marvellous accents without the loudness of beading, 3/4 jackets . . . everything is here for the morning brunch, afternoon bar mitzvah or evening wedding.

"A coward is incapable of exhibiting love; it is the prerogative of the brave" — Jeremy Tayloy

"Love, like life, catches us off guard. With all due respect to bungee-jumpers, this is the greatest freefall one can possibly experience" — S.N. O'Graw

A paradise for mothers

Ball gowns are back in style, and Amandalina's has a selection that will enable mothers to give their daughters a run for their money (though who's competing?).

To facilitate your visit, Amandalina's has a separate children's play room complete with large-screen TV and plenty of toys to keep your children occupied while you shop.

Preferring to convey a feeling of comfort rather than an aura of exclusivity, Amandalina's carries the top designer lines but displays them in a leisurely environment and with a low-key approach that many other shops lack. Many brides have expressed their satisfaction with being able to drop by and browse in an initial visit without feeling compelled to buy.

In keeping with the relaxed atmosphere, Sam and Rachelle encourage their customers to touch the merchandise. "Ours is not an ivory-tower approach," says Sam. "It's great to have beautiful silks and satins, but part of feeling comfortable with your purchase is being able to actually run the fabric through your fingers."

Amandalina's carries some of the top names in bridal and evening wear. Prices range from $300 to $2000 for cocktail dresses and from $700 to $4000 for wedding gowns. They're happy to custom fit your gown, and will also custom design a dress for you if that is your preference.

Located at 4040 Steeles Avenue West in "The Bridal Mall", Amandalina's is a ten-minute drive from north Toronto, twenty to thirty minutes from downtown. Parking is ample and free . . . as a bird.

Arafat: covenant won't change...

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

GAZA — Days after his election to head the Palestinian Council, Yasser Arafat will not commit himself to revoking the sections of the Palestine National Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel.

"The covenant is like your American Constitution," he said last week in an interview. "You do not delete sections of your Constitution; you amend it."

And in Arafat's view, the Palestinians "have already amended it."

Arafat's position – adopted either for dealing with recalcitrant members of the Palestinian leadership or for presenting a firm bargaining stance with Israel – could lead to a complete disruption of the peace process.

Since the elections, Israeli officials from Prime Minister Shimon Peres on down have insisted that Arafat must now revoke the offending clauses as agreed to under the Israeli-Palestinian peace accords.

Revoking those clauses is considered by Israelis to be an important symbol of reconciliation between the two peoples.

Speaking at the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee last Tuesday, Peres said that if the PLO failed to live up to its obligation under the peace accords, there would be no final-status negotiations, which include the future of Jerusalem and other sensitive issues.

... Peres: Palestine state 'a dream'

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres has said Palestinian vows to create an independent state are "a dream."

Peres' comments came after he met last Wednesday night with PLO leader Yasser Arafat, who, speaking to Egyptian journalists earlier in Gaza, said a Palestinian state could come into being within a year and a half, if negotiations were conducted intensively.

The two leaders, meeting at the Erez crossing along the Israel-Gaza border, discussed the results of the Palestinian elections, a Palestinian demand for additional prisoner releases and Israel's insistence that the Palestine National Covenant be amended.

The meeting came a day after Arafat, in an interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency in Gaza, said he would not commit himself to revoking or amending those sections of the covenant calling for the destruction of Israel.

Peres' meeting with Arafat was the first time the two leaders had come face-to-face since the PLO leader won the presidency of the Palestinian Council.

After the elections, Peres said he would permit all members of the Palestine National Council (PNC), even those opposed to the peace accords and those with Jewish blood on their hands, to return to the West Bank and Gaza to participate in a meeting of the PNC in order to change the covenant.

According to the peace accords, the amendment of the charter must occur no later than two months after the inauguration of the new Palestinian government. All of the 88 newly elected members of the Palestinian Council will become members of the PNC.

One of the PNC's existing members is Nayef Hawatmeh of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. He was behind the 1974 massacre in Ma'alot in northern Israel in which 21 schoolchildren were killed.

Funding argument made

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The briefs have been submitted, the arguments have been made and all that is left for Jewish parents with children in day schools is to await the careful deliberations of Canada's highest court.

A full nine-judge panel of the Supreme Court of Canada last week heard lawyers for parents with children in Jewish day schools and their colleagues representing parents with children in Protestant schools argue for provincial funding for their educational institutions.

Lawyer Ed Morgan, who represented the five Jewish parents on a pro bono basis, rested his case on two key arguments: that the current practice of funding only Roman Catholic religious schools violates the equality provisions of the Charter of Rights

Free trade: a sign of the times

Will enhance friendship between countries: Yerushalmi

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A free trade agreement recently negotiated between Canada and Israel will enhance the friendship between the two countries, said Eli Yerushalmi, chargé d'affaires of the Israeli Embassy, last week.

"The relationship between Canada and Israel has always been friendly, but the amount of trade has always been small. When you are looking at friendly countries, part of this friendship has to be economical," he said.

The deal, which eliminates most tariffs on imports, is scheduled to be signed in Ottawa by Jean Chrétien and Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres on March 19. It will go into effect in July.

Israel already has free trade agreements with the European Union, the European Free Trade Association and the United States.

Yerushalmi said free trade is just one sign of a warming relationship between Canada and Israel. Another is the successful government supported Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, which promotes research partnerships between Israel and Canada.

In a wide-ranging interview with The CJN, Yerushalmi looked ahead to the key issues of 1996 for Israel.

The peace process continues to be the central concern. With the withdrawal of Israeli troops from most cities in the West Bank and Gaza and the election of Yassar Arafat and a governing council last week, Israel and the Palestinians have entered a new phase of the peace process.

"There is no way back in the peace process. This is something for which it is just a matter of speed: Is it going to go faster or slower? But the peace process is there and eventually it will lead, we hope, to a peace with all the Arab states surrounding [Israel]," Yerushalmi said.

The first red letter date arrives two months from now. According to the terms of the peace agreement, within two months of the first election, the PLO is to renounce those parts of its covenant that call for the destruction of the State of Israel.

In May, Israel and the PLO enter a three-year period of negotiating the most sensitive issues: the status of Jerusalem (which both Israel and the Palestinians claim as their capital), the future of the Jewish settlements in the territories, extending a right of return to Palestinian refugees and control of water sources.

"We hope that during those years the Interim Agreement will provide us with more opportunity to coexist and will lead us to an atmosphere of peace between the two nations," Yerushalmi said.

Negotiations with Syria continue. Peace with Syria is central to a comprehensive regional peace. The key issues are security, territory and control of water. But first Israel and Syria have to agree on what peace is.

"What exactly do the Syrians mean by peace?" Yerushalmi asked. "Is it the peace that we understand as peace? We mean open borders, tourists, embassies ... That's what we think peace is and for this we are willing to pay a tremendous price. But first we need to know if this is what the Syrians think peace is," he said.

Within Israel, the population will continue to struggle with divided opinions about the peace process, Yerushalmi said. The conflicts which ultimately led to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin have not disappeared. But while Israel hears from its extremists, he said, most Israelis lean towards the centre. Some he said, lean slightly right of centre, some lean slightly left. Whatever happens during the next few months of PLO rule will influence the way Israeli voters turn in the next Israeli election, which could be called as early as June.

"The next election in Israel ... will be a crucial election," Yerushalmi said. "This will be an election in which the Israeli people decide on the way we are going ... There is no doubt that both parties want peace, but everyone has a different scenario on how to do it."

Jerusalem plays host to world's Jewish media

This column is being written in Israel at my desk in a room on the 14th floor of a hotel on one of the highest promontories in West Jerusalem.

The sun has already appeared in the eastern sky. It slowly lifts away the night's starry curtain, giving shape and definition to the gold-beige hills below and the fine-lined horizon all around. Though it is yet early in the day, the pure, pale blue of this cloudless morning promises that before too long, the light will reach very far in a deep blue sky.

From my balcony facing south, merely metres away is the Supreme Court of Israel. Beyond it a small distance, in a straight line of sight, is the Knesset.

Each is a uniquely elegant architectural landmark, taking from and returning strength to the land on which it sits, an inspiring symbol of restored, sovereign Jewish life.

The hotel is a microcosm of the city. It is packed with visitors from all over the world, including, of course, this one from Canada.

On my way to breakfast, I overheard five different languages spoken, four of which I could identify, in a short but tightly-squeezed 14-storey elevator ride.

I am in Jerusalem to represent The CJN and to take part in the sixth International Conference of the Jewish Media, a biennial conference, described by the organizers as the world's largest gathering of international Jewish print, radio and TV journalists.

Not surprisingly, given the trimillennial birthday celebrations, the main theme of the conference is Jerusalem. The peace process also makes the week-long agenda, as does the Jewish conference "favorite," continuity and Zionism.

An impressive list of speakers has been lined up, including the prime minister, the leader of the Opposition and the mayor of Jerusalem. True to sabra form, virtually no subject is taboo; no opinion appears to be expected.

For example, one of the sessions highlights the opinions of the Holy See as well as those of the Islamic movement, on the subject of Jerusalem. It follows a presentation by Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau entitled Picking up the Pieces.

Ziad Abu Ziad, a member of the Palestinian Ministerial Committee on Jerusalem is slated to address the group about the Oslo accords, while Shulamit Aloni and Rabbi Yehuda Amital will be sharing a platform on the subject of Jewish Continuity in a Modern Society.

I intend to write about the conference and the general goings-on in Israel in the weeks to come.

As all readers of The CJN know, the goings-on in Israel are like a reel of film played at high speed. It is a fast-paced, intense melange of diverse peoples, ideas and ways of life. It can be, and for many is, emotionally as well as physically exhausting. The reality of Israel no longer matches the former comforting image of the youthful pioneer soldiers planting and defending the land, and dancing around the bonfire at night.

Israel today is a modern, successfully integrated agricultural and industrial society. They still plant and defend. But most of the dancing goes on till all hours of the morning in the clubs of Tel Aviv, not in the fields being harvested.

Occasionally, the reel slows down and we see the kindness and the kindred feelings of shared responsibility and common destiny that are blurred but deeply embedded underneath the "screaming" daily newspaper headlines, constantly honking car horns and ubiquitous cellular telephones.

Worthwhile reading.

Global Vision, Martin Peretz, New Republic, Jan. 22, 1996

Peretz, editor-in-chief and chair of the New Republic comments upon the tendency of the Boston Globe to overlook every dubious behavior of Yasser Arafat, except bullying a newspaperman. This is only Peretz's ostensible purpose.

His main aim is to show that many Arab Christians in the newly autonomous regions are choosing to leave their homes or become Israeli citizens, rather than live under Muslim PLO rule.

"Over the last decades, Christian Arabs have been fleeing the Holy Land by the tens of thousands, grasping finally that Palestinian nationalism is just another version of Muslim piety."

Jews, Muslims may form group to promote dialogue

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A meeting to explore the possibility of forming an association to promote dialogue between Jews and Muslims in the Greater Toronto Area was held in Mississauga recently.

"I thought it was a worthwhile exchange of views," said Mel Shipman, past president of Peace Now, one of 19 people who attended.

Because the meeting coincided with Ramadan, the 40-day Muslim fasting period, it was decided to hold off further action until after the next meeting, Shipman said.

There was a representative of Temple Solel, Mississauga, at the meeting.

"I was invited but I didn't know what the purpose of the meeting was and I didn't attend," said Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, chair of the region's Israel Affairs Committee.

CJC has no link

"There are as many Muslims in the greater Toronto as there are Jews," said Jack Stevens, a Jew, co-convenor of the meeting along with Shahad Akhtar.

"We want to promote dialogue and understanding," he said.

The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region has no links with the proposed new organization, according to Manuel Prutschi, executive director.

But CJC regional officers have attended and hosted other meetings with leading Muslims as part of Congress' interaction program, Prutschi said. These included a meeting with Baher Abdel Munem, PLO representative in Ottawa, his first official function in Canada.

A delegation of CJC officers also met in Ottawa with Faisal Hussini, a minister of the Palestine National Authority and chief PLO negotiator in the peace talks in October.

The next day, through the good offices of Shawhy Fahel, a prominent Palestinian leader in the Kitchener-Waterloo area, Hussini met with CJC regional officers and representatives of Peace Now.

To be effective, an organization promoting dialogue between Muslims and Jews should have official representatives of both groups, said Rashad Faleh, chair of Palestine House, who attended the meeting.

Finestone out; Gray stays in cabinet shuffle

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) reacted to last week's federal cabinet shuffle by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, re-emphasizing its concerns relating to various government departments.

"We wish Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and his new cabinet the best of luck in carrying out their critical responsibilities and we express deep appreciation to the outgoing ministers for their years of dedicated public service," CJC president Goldie Hershon said in a statement.

The cabinet lost one Jewish member, as Montreal MP Sheila Finestone, secretary of state for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women, announced she is resigning from politics.

The other Jewish minister, House Leader and Solicitor General Herb Gray, stays in his post.

A number of departments involved in the shuffle relate to CJC's ongoing agenda. The following CJC analysis of areas of concern to the Jewish community includes the names of the new ministers, with their predecessors in brackets.

Finestone ... goes

Gray ... stays

Citizenship and Immigration, Lucienne Robillard (Sergio Marchi): Vigorous action against suspected Nazi war criminals in denaturalization and deportation cases; ongoing concern about the declining importance of family reunification as the cornerstone of Canadian immigration policy.

Foreign Affairs, Lloyd Axworthy (André Ouellet): Ongoing Canadian support for Israel and the peace process; protection for and promotion of human rights in the former Soviet Bloc and emerging East European countries and elsewhere; special emphasis on the elimination of anti-Semitism as a form of racism/discrimination.

Intergovernmental Affairs, Stéphane Dion (Marcel Massé): Ongoing efforts to strengthen Canadian national unity.

Human Resources Development, Doug Young (Lloyd Axworthy): Monitoring national and community impact of changes to social safety net; implementation of Employment Equity Act.

National Revenue, Jane Stewart (David Anderson): Ongoing role of Canada Customs in preventing the importation of hate propaganda; ensuring support for prosecutions of those who wilfully defraud the government by falsely claiming an exemption from kosher food taxes.

Public Works, Diane Marleau (David Dingwall): Ongoing role of Canada Post in keeping hate literature out of Canada.

Secretary of State (Multiculturalism and Status of Women), Hedy Fry (Sheila Finestone): Continued support for multiculturalism in Canada; ongoing role in developing anti-racism initiatives; support for initiatives to improve status of women.

The following ministers remain in their portfolios:

Solicitor General Herb Gray: Proactive efforts by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) against white supremacist and neo-Nazi groups and in fulfilment of its counter-terrorism mandate (changes to the CSIS Act to be implemented permitting the service to warn directly endangered Canadians of threats to their lives); maintaining effective, adequately-funded War Crimes and special Investigation Section of the RCMP; ensuring maximum cooperation with Justice Department counterparts.

Justice, Allan Rock: Urgent prosecution of Nazi war criminals in Canada through the use of civil as well as criminal remedies (applies to cases underway and the need for immediate action against other suspects, cases which will provide jurisprudence to take legal action against war criminals from other conflicts should they turn up in Canada; support for vigorous implementation of the anti-hate laws of the Criminal Code (in cooperation with provincial attorneys general); the attorneys general to ensure the consistent implementation across the country of the new sentence-enhancement provisions for hate-motivated crimes (in cooperation with Crown attorneys and judges); consideration of various options to deal with hate on the Internet; prompt tabling of legislation to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act. (The bill should include sexual orientation in the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination and should clarify employers' obligations regarding "reasonable accommodation" for employees with disabilities.)

National Defence, David Collenette: Rooting out white supremacist, neo-Nazi elements in Canadian Armed Forces and improving enlistment-screening and sensitization policies to ensure zero tolerance for racism in Canadian military; maintaining an effective anti-terrorist unit.

Government seeks to deport 90-year-old war crime suspect

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 90-year-old man living in Hope, B.C., is one of two war crimes suspects that federal immigration authorities are seeking to deport.

Antanas Kenstavicius allegedly misrepresented his wartime activities when he sought entry to Canada, Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) spokesperson Paul Hardy said.

Contacted by telephone at their home in Hope, about 150 kilometres east of Vancouver, Kenstavicius' wife Stella told The CJN, "You cannot talk to him. He's sick in bed."

She said her husband had suffered 10 heart attacks, had been revived four times from the brink of death by CPR and was currently suffering from a blood clot in his leg.

Asked if she knew about her husband's wartime activities, she said in heavily accented English: "I cannot answer for somebody else. I didn't know his history."

She said she met her husband for the first time in Montreal in 1952. Asked if he had ever spoken about his wartime experiences, she said her husband had been wounded during the war, and when asked again, she responded, "Nobody gives candy in the war. They only give bullets. I don't know what happens before."

She referred The CJN to her husband's lawyer, Rosanne Newman, but the Hope lawyer did not return telephone calls. She is quoted in the Vancouver Sun as saying, "I'm not prepared to make any comment at this time."

Kenstavicius, who worked for CN Rail until he retired at 65, is the fifth war crimes suspect federal authorities are seeking to remove. A sixth man, reportedly living in the greater Toronto area, has not been named.

The Justice Department's war crimes unit has transferred a total of 12 cases to Immigration Department authorities for legal action. Up to last week, four cases had been launched, three to strip suspects of their citizenship (Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck) and a fourth to deport (Joseph Nemsila).

Lawyers for Kenstavicius and the federal government have agreed to put the Kenstavicius case on hold pending the decision of Federal Court Judge James Jerome in the Nemsila case, Hardy said.

Kenstavicius, like Nemsila, is not a Canadian citizen and so Jerome's decision in the Nemsila case would set a legal precedent that would be binding on Immigration officials, he said.

Federal authorities are seeking to deport Nemsila, who allegedly was part of a Slovak unit that deported Jews to death camps, for misrepresenting his wartime activities. However, an IRB adjudicator ruled that Nemsila's domicile status prevented authorities from removing him.

That ruling is currently under appeal before Jerome, who is scheduled to hear legal arguments in the case on Jan. 31 and Feb. 1.

Irving Abella, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress on war crimes issues, said, "It's encouraging that the government is still continuing with these prosecutions.

"It's distressing that [Kenstavicius] has been in the country for almost 50 years and only after he's finished his life that we try to deport him. Given the slothfulness of the court system, he'll probably never be deported."

B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant applauded federal authorities for initiating legal action against Kenstavicius.

"For the sake of history and the victims of the Holocaust, all alleged war criminals should be brought before the courts. The passage of time does not diminish the nature of the crimes these individuals are alleged to have committed," he said.

Shop combines charity with dignity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Dignity and charity combine at the Just a Second Shop.

The choc-a-block store at 3418 Bathurst St., between Lawrence and Wilson, offers new and "gently-used" clothes for clients of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) as well as those who just drop in, at bargain prices.

Clients of either agency are given a letter which entitles them to whatever they need at no or little cost.

But, explains Florence Weinberger, JF&CS executive assistant, "not everyone wants to announce" that they are needy, so some prefer not to show the letter.

Goods are not tagged, and the two staff, manager Galina Svechinsky and Clara Ifrah and eight volunteers use their discretion.

At a recent visit, for instance, a warm winter jacket was sold for $6 and a pair of shoes for $1.

Manufacturers often donate new clothes to Just a Second, and the public donate much of the stock.

"Everything is sorted, and we use the best stuff," Svechinsky told The CJN.

Although men's, women's and children's clothes are the focus of the stock, one can also find purses, toys, books, small appliances, dishes and kitchenware. There are even a few sheitls.

Many of the clients are recent Russian immigrants, Svechinsky notes, but others are, for instance, members of the religious community with large families and little income.

"It serves the needs of people in the community who have a need," Weinberger says. "Sometimes being able to shop here enables them not to become clients [of JF&CS or JIAS], or to need less help from us."

The Just a Second Shop has served over 30,000 people since it opened in 1982, sometimes as many as 150 to 300 a day, says Svechinsky.

The store also helps the volunteers, Weinberger says. "It helps them to keep active, and is an opportunity for them to give back to the community."

The store is open Sunday from 10 a.m. to 3, and Monday to Thursday from 11 to 6.

For more information, or to donate, contact Florence Weinberger at 638-7800, ext. 214. To volunteer, call Joan Stevens at 638-7800, ext. 266.

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5; regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5 which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Feminists gather to share social, religious views

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a Jewish feminist columnist, Michele Landsberg often feels like "a lone voice," but at a recent weekend conference, aptly titled From Memory To Transformation: Jewish Women's Voices, the Toronto Star writer was joined by 500 other Jewish feminists.

The group that gathered at the Colony Hotel from Jan. 19 to 21 was hardly homogeneous, however. Lesbians and straight women, young and old, Orthodox and secular shared concerns and ideas about a variety of social, political and religious issues.

A large number of participants said they were energized by the diversity of the conference, the second of its kind in Toronto (the first was held three years ago), but several younger women objected to the $125 fee on the basis of socio-economic class discrimination.

Although subsidies were available, "it's difficult to ask," said one woman, adding she'd prefer "a little less glamor and food, and more inclusion."

Landsberg was one of four speakers taking part in a wrap-up panel moderated by Judy Rebick, co-host of CBC Newsworld's Face-Off and former president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Sharing the platform with Landsberg were Aviva Rubin, equity consultant at the Ontario Women's Directorate and a founding member of the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League (JFAFL); and the conference's keynote speakers Norma Baumel Joseph and Melanie Kaye/Kantrowitz.

Joseph is president of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights and an assistant professor in the department of religion at Montreal's Concordia University. Kaye/Kantrowitz, former executive director of the New York City-based Jews for Racial and Economic Justice, is a feminist and lesbian activist who has also been involved in Middle East peace work.

"The world does not know that we [Jewish feminists] exist," said Landsberg. "The world thinks Jews are those people who turn up in the Star every Pesach — it's always a guy with a kippah ... [and] the traditional nuclear family.

"I have nothing against that family. I just don't want them to be the only family. I don't want Frank Dimant [executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada] to be the only voice of the Jewish community."

Lack of support

In a letter to the editor last year, Dimant objected to a controversial column Landsberg had written on the memorial service for Yitzhak Rabin, criticizing the Jewish community for not denouncing vicious rhetoric.

Landsberg bemoaned the lack of support for that column from "progressive Jews" — not for support per se, but so that readers know the writers exist.

"There's only one kind of Jewishness reflected in the media — male-dominant, reactionary, right-wing, moneyed, privileged, throwing their weight around.

"That's what all the unaffiliated Jews think we are. There are thousands of ethical, principled women who don't affiliate [with the Jewish community] because of the image that we have allowed to be in the media. They think that's all there is. We need you and want you back. You don't need to be right wing to be Jewish."

Letters matter tremendously, Landsberg emphasized, urging women to make their views known.

Along with the other panelists, Landsberg called on those present to translate their concerns into action, to push for change in Jewish institutions with which they are affiliated, and to join groups such as JFAFL and Jews Against the Harris Cuts, protesting Ontario government cutbacks.

For Joseph, who is Orthodox, religion and social activism are intertwined.

"Without putting your body on the line, it doesn't matter how hard you sway when you pray," she said to a burst of applause.

Although Joseph believes that traditional Jewish texts are authoritative, they are also flawed, she said. Regarding Jewish divorce laws and agunot (women whose husbands won't grant them a Jewish divorce), the texts are "radically" flawed.

"It takes great courage to be an activist," she noted, cautioning that the path is risky and lonely.

Rubin believes there is a "crisis" in activism. "Our Jewish memories of oppression can and must be put to work to eliminate all forms of oppression," she said.

She lauded JFAFL, a 3-year-old group which has organized events such as a commemoration of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, as representing for many of its members "the first time we could bring [to a group] all of our selves — our Jewishness, our sexual orientation, our activism and our strong sense of social justice."

(JFAFL does have heterosexual members, Rubin told The CJN later, but for non-straight members, it's "a comfortable place to be out and to be queer.")

Kaye/Kantrowitz noted that at a New York City anti-racism conference at which she spoke, lesbian attendees were quicker to identify themselves proudly by sexual orientation than Jews were to identify themselves as Jewish.

"There was nothing that had taught them to be proud [of the Jewish] heritage of fighting racism," she said.

She urged audience members to think about identifying themselves [publicly] as Jewish if they don't already.

Israel and Diaspora

One of Israel's leading writers, A. B. Yehoshua, stunned Diaspora leaders into a disappointing and deflating silence in Jerusalem last week at a meeting of the Global Assembly of the World Jewish Congress.

In clear, forceful language for which the Israeli author is quite renowned, he was reported to have told the audience: "We don't need you any more. We don't need either the money or the political support. Go outside; you see a prosperous state, a blooming state. For it to take money is a real crime."

Yehoshua's message was condemned at the assembly the very next day by Yehiel Leket, head of the Jewish Agency's Youth Aliyah department.

For those of us who read Yehoshua's comments in the newspaper no less than for those who heard them first hand in the large assembly hall, his words cut like a hot knife searing pain deep into our hearts. It was not because he suggested financial aid from the Diaspora was no longer required that we felt the pain. After all, he is not the first prominent Israeli to offer that same advice. Yossi Beilin, a cabinet minister in the present Israeli government publicly broached the subject more than a year ago.

Israel is a prosperous land, thank God. It has a booming economy, ever-expanding industrial strength and relatively low unemployment. This wonderful, invigorating truth has not been lost on Diaspora leaders. Indeed they celebrate it. Moreover, it is weighed into their "allocations" equation along with consideration of increasing financial needs closer to home. Most federations across North America are already re-examining the paradigm of their funding formulas.

The pain in Yehoshua's admonishing words stems from the shallow, misconceived notion about the Israel-Diaspora relationship which his words betray. According to the Jerusalem Post, Yehoshua said, "The funeral of [former] prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, attended by hundreds of foreign dignitaries, showed that Israel no longer needs help from overseas Jews to confirm its legitimacy."

He sees the entire purpose of Diaspora involvement in Israel's life as having been to "confirm its legitimacy" of place and status within the world of nations. With place achieved and status secured, Diaspora involvement according to Yehoshua is not only unnecessary, it is also unseemly — "a real crime." His view of the Israel-Diaspora connection is utilitarian, merely functional, devoid of any deeper meaning. It has no wider sweep than this one moment in time — February 1996. It lacks any memory and denies all history. It has no wider reach than a pat on one's back. Worst of all, it relegates to irrelevance the very core of the relationship, the heart of all hearts, the religious, cultural, national and metaphysical tie that ties us together — our Judaism. It is secularism carried to yet a new extreme.

Thankfully, it is a view which is rejected by most Israelis and Israeli leaders. Prime Minister Shimon Peres is working on a far-reaching program to coincide with the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Conference in Basel in 1897, which, in the words of Prof. Yehezkel Dror, will "re-found Zionism" and re-shape the Israel-Diaspora relationships even as the people reshapes itself heading into the next millenium.

Avraham Burg, head of the Jewish Agency, is also proposing new, more responsive ways to take the Israel-Diaspora relationship to an even higher level. One of his suggestions is to establish the University of Judaism in Israel to foster leadership and connection and Jewishness through meaningful education and experience.

The relationship between Israel and the Diaspora is in transition. But it is not, as Yehoshua suggests, irrelevant. He might as well suggest that Jewish history itself has become irrelevant. On second thought, perhaps he should keep his suggestions to himself.

Criticism of Harris government unfair

Re: "Cutbacks hit women, youth and poor" by Feministyot (CJN, Jan. 18).

We all know the suffering inflicted on various groups within our society as a result of budgetary cutbacks at all levels of government. Because provincial cuts more directly affect us than those at the federal level, the Mike Harris administration is being targeted for a greater share of criticism, I believe, than it deserves.

Granted, the most vulnerable people are always the first to suffer, and I, for one, fervently wish that it wasn't so.

Unfortunately, critics like Feministyot fail to answer the crucial question: Just where, exactly, will the money come from? Over the years, administrations of all political stripes at all levels have successfully overspent to the point of bankruptcy. Do they continue to overspend and simply leave it to our children to find a way out of the ever-deepening financial bind?

Other critics have contended that "the rich" do not pay their fair share of taxes. Just who are "the rich"? Is it the couple who are fortunate to have jobs that bring an annual gross income of $100,000 into the household? How much extra tax should the greater-earning partner pay? Their tax burden, as it is, is crippling.

"Big Business" is also a popular target. To truly "create" new jobs the province has to attract even more "Big Business;" and to keep on attracting more job creators, the province or city has to provide a suitable climate for those enterprises to prosper. Designing ever-tightening taxation strategies ultimately becomes counter-productive, as the "job-creators" are driven to more favorable locations.

Finally, government spending to artificially "create" jobs has been tried before. It is precisely that type of policy that has created much of the debt that all levels of government are saddled with today.

Spending ourselves into the poorhouse is the last way to help the disadvantaged among us.

Reduce air fares for national unity

I think it would be a great idea to mark the anniversary of the Montreal national rally, every October, with a National Unity Week, during which travel related expenses (air, bus and rail fares, hotel, car rental, tourist attractions) would be substantially reduced.

Question views of Prof. Lockshin

At the end of his article "Orthodox Jews must do some soul searching" (CJN, Jan. 18), Martin Lockshin wonders whether he should identify with "Jews who share my views about the divine origin of the Torah but call Rabin a moser. Or with Jews who believe in change through democratic means, who renounce vigilante behavior, who pursue peace and eschew hateful rhetoric."

I was outraged that earlier in the article, he engaged in hateful rhetoric against the former rabbi of my synagogue and a renowned Torah scholar, Rabbi Nachum L. Rabinovitch.

Lockshin describes himself "as an Orthodox rabbi." He neglects to mention, however, that he was a supporter of the Peace Now movement long before the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. This information should have been included in the article. The reader could then decide whether the author's vicious attack against Rabbi Rabinovitch was motivated by concerns about Orthodoxy or political considerations.

Leonard C. Warner
Toronto

Orthodox Jews are target of attacks

In the interest of journalistic balance, you should have identified Prof. Martin Lockshin as an active member of Peace Now. (CJN, Jan. 18.)

Lockshin implies that Orthodox Jews unjustifiably see themselves as victims of systemic discrimination. He fails to give even a hint of the sources of the barrage of hateful rhetoric with which the Orthodox community is being bombarded, not by fringe elements, but by government ministers and officials.

Examples: a minister calls for cutting of funding for religious institutions; another advocates the shutting down of hesder yeshivot; yet another official calls for the expulsion of Jews from Hebron; and the head of the Jewish Agency compares Bar Ilan University to Teheran.

Lockshin's statement that Baruch Goldstein and Yigal Amir attended the finest Orthodox schools may be a fact. To even suggest that their heinous acts were the result of the education they received there, or that they are representative of the students of these institutions, is a slander of the worst kind.

Prof. Lockshin, in his singleminded pursuit of peace, would do well to take his own advice to also "eschew hateful rhetoric."

Tu b'Shvat truly represents a sense of wonder

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

If the truth be told, Judaism does not trust nature. The religion which successfully banished paganism from the popular imagination has never wholeheartedly embraced the great outdoors.

To be sure, there are a myriad of biblical and halachic sources which detail our obligation to respect the environment. From the concept of shmitta, the sabbatical year in which Jewish farmers are commanded to let their fields rest for a 12-month period, to the prohibition against uprooting a fruit tree, the Bible decries any wanton waste of our natural resources. The Torah calls such abuse of the environment bal tashchit, a term that denotes the wary gaze which tradition casts on anyone who would throw away an uneaten tuna sandwich, much less poison the ecosphere.

Someone wishing to research Judaism's stance on the environment would have little difficulty in presenting source after source which, in theory at least, reveals the Torah's ecologically correct code of ethics. The Talmud devotes much space to the effect that everything on earth is God's creation and thus must be approached with sensitivity and temperance.

We are not allowed to exploit the world according to our whim, without restriction. As the medieval commentator Abraham Ibn Ezra points out, "The ignorant have compared humankind's rule over the earth with God's rule over the heavens. This is incorrect, for God rules over everything."

For those who might imagine that the sages were out of sync with the environment, guess again. Halachah displays a resoundingly contemporary attitude towards blue boxes and the ozone layer.

But as another Tu b'Shvat — the "birthday of the trees" — passes on the calendar, we hear yet again the sound of indifference in our Diaspora forest. To call it a minor festival is unfortunately to overstate the case; for many Jews, the day passes with nary a trace of recognition or celebration. Yes, there is a custom of eating different species of fruit on that day, especially fruit that is indigenous to the land of Israel. Still, with no references to the holiday in the Bible and little in the way of historical significance, Tu b'Shvat remains at the outer edge of the Jewish consciousness, even in many religious circles.

What remains peripheral to Jewish communities, however, often alerts us to what we value as a people and what we stress in our religious teachings. Put another way, were an ancient pagan to spy the arrival of Tu b'Shvat or its equivalent on the calendar, it would be the catalyst for serious devotion and even riotous revelry. The birthday of the trees — now that's cause for a holiday! During a drought in ancient China, for instance, the emperor offered himself as a sacrifice to the wood of a pine tree, perceived as a god. And of course, the Egyptians revered the sun as a deity. And so the Torah came as a desacredization of nature; no longer would the wind and the stars be sources of holiness or objects of worship.

The cautionary note that is sounded everywhere in Tanach is the inevitable result of the war that Judaism fought against polytheism and the idea that nature was divinity. Whereas Judaism would denounce the destruction or abuse of the environment, it views with suspicion and even horror those in the environmental community who often seem to approach nature as a source of some quasi-religious value or moral guidance. We are the people of the Book, not of the bark.

Probably the quintessential example of rabbinic caution when it comes to the enjoyment of the natural world can be found in the teaching of Rabbi Yaakov in the third chapter of Pirke Avot — The Ethics of Our Fathers: "One who is walking along the road and reviewing his [Torah] learning, and interrupts his study to proclaim, 'How beautiful is that tree! How beautiful is that field,' Scripture regards him as if he has sinned against [forfeited] his soul."

This sober warning against staring at the trees has been variously interpreted as a wholesale rejection of nature or, more moderately, as a parable about constructing the proper hierarchy of values in one's life (i.e. material pleasures are okay, but not when they interfere with spiritual pursuits).

If a brief glance at the farmer's field produces such a stern Mishnaic scolding, is it any wonder, then, that the appeal of Tu b'Shvat can become somewhat muted, especially when we mark the day surrounded by the high rise structures of the modern urban landscape? Perhaps Rabbi Yaakov would have little to fear today, given that few of us even stop to glance at the trees at all, even when we have forgotten our pocket Mishnayot at home.

In our current context, Tu b'Shvat becomes a poignant reminder of the gulf between Diaspora Judaism and the potential for Jewish life that can only be fulfilled in Eretz Yisrael, where even the most secular of school children is aware of the birthday of the trees, and where the preservation of the environment garners meaning as a distinctly Jewish imperative.

Indeed, according to Ahad Ha'am, our Mishnah in Avot was really referring to nature in the Diaspora, where Judaism rests exclusively with our attachment to our religious texts. Once the Jewish nation returns to Israel, however, the balance between words and woods can again be harmonized.

Philosophically, there is much to appreciate in this Mishnah. We live in an age where every children's tape is filled with the requisite song about the environment. As Dennis Prager once noted, given the choice between saving their dog and a stranger if both should be found drowning in a river, many young people would opt for the canine, or at least have a hard time deciding.

The determination of Judaism, in contrast, is consistent and unapologetic. Human life supersedes everything else, whether it be whales or trees or butterflies, and human life is grounded in the imperatives of the divine word. All things being equal, there is nothing wrong with getting up before the crack of dawn and breathing in the wonders of the rain forest. But in human life things are not equal very often.

Most of the time, we are faced with an either/or situation. Either we watch an hour of television or devote an hour to studying the weekly Torah portion; either we spend Shabbat in conversation with our family or we disperse to the four corners of the video store. For Rabbi Yaakov, the moral life inherent in the study of Torah must never get short shrift, not even when the marvels of nature beckon.

Yet one can't help but feel a certain stinginess in Rabbi Yaakov's ostensibly rational pronouncement of Judaic priorities. The heart protests: "But what's wrong with a momentary appreciation of the world around me, with a fleeting glance directed at the beauty of he environment?" Must the study of texts and the carrying out of rituals constitute the be all and end all of religious accomplishment?

According to one 19th-century scholar, the proverbial walk in the woods would actually comprise a superior form of spiritual awarenesss, if human beings could consistently link what they saw with the glory of God. Says the Minhat Shabbat, Rabbi Yosef Hayim Caro, in his comments on this Mishnah, that "were it not for the danger of failure, this way [the contemplation of nature as opposed to textual study] would be the superior one. If people's consciousness were fuller they would know the Creator from the wonder of His creatures and His acts."

But Rabbi Caro concludes that most of us would inevitably fail to discern God in every grain of sand and eventually a tree would just appear to us as well ... a tree. Here the study of Torah is indispensable, gracing us with a formidable perspective from which to interpret what we look at and to invest what we see with spiritual value.

In short, the world without Torah becomes rather prosaic, where the stars in the sky are just another subject for scientific journals. But with Torah — that is, the kind of Torah to which Rabbi Caro so wistfully alludes, a Torah which fuses study with a larger reality rather than closing in on itself — nature becomes, as the medievals were wont to call it, "God's book."

In my interactions with Jewish high school students — the vast majority of whom are intelligent, good natured and, for the most part, respectful — one of the things that has become most striking for me is their remarkable lack of a certain kind of innocence, or as Heschel might have it, a genuine sense of wonder. As I thought about this, I could not simply pass it off with the wearisome "alas, the kids of today ..." pronouncement that vaguely attempts to vilify contemporary adolescents to satisfy our own feelings of perplexity. Rather, this inchoate sense of wonder has been forgotten on a societal scale and so is inevitably reflected in our youth.

Have we lost touch with the enchantment of the world? We are enlightened, rational, scientific. We have hi-tech control over vast quantities of information, but often remain utterly alienated from words like sacred. When I scoff at taking the time to appreciate the flowers, I scoff at my own peril. We live life too hurriedly and with too little serenity.

Oliver Sacks, in his brilliant book on the world of the deaf, points out that it is all too easy to take language, one's own language, for granted — one may need to encounter another language, or rather another mode of language, in order to be astonished, pushed into wonder again.

What Tu b'Shvat represents more than enything else is a sense of wonder, a profound reawakening to the possibility of meaning that imbues everyday life. For those who yearn to reconnect to a living vibrant essence of Judaism, it is worthwhile learning to read the language of the divine in the world around us, to proclaim, in the words of the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins: "Glory be to God for dappled things." Only then can nature truly regain its place as one of "God's books."

The not-so-secret service

For the first time in its 50-year history, Israel's secret service, the Shin Bet, is the focus of an unprecedented public debate. The recent publication in the Israeli press of the name of the Shin Bet's incoming chief, Gen. Ami Ayalon, in defiance of censorship regulations, stripped away yet another veil from the secretive, mythical ranks of Israel's domestic intelligence service.

By Shira Herzog

The security failure that preceded the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin on Nov. 4 led to the resignation of several senior directors of the service, including its chief, Carmi Gilon, whose expertise lay, ironically, in the field of extremist Jewish groups, and who served in the job only 10 months. Although his appointment was controversial at the time because some felt that he lacked sufficient experience in the field of Arab terrorism, Gilon's brief tenure was marked by several significant achievements.

In January of last year, Islamic terrorism was at a high. Rabin viewed these attacks as a strategic challenge that was demoralizing the people and endangering the peace process. Under Gilon, the number of attacks diminished and, more importantly, over 40 terrorist attacks were prevented. The lengthy list of wanted men was reduced to one page and several active terrorist cells were eliminated.

Gilon also actively prepared the Shin Bet for the challenges of a new era. In the aftermath of Oslo 2, the service can no longer operate freely in the field under the cover of the Israel army. The future battleground will be one of classic counter-intelligence, wit and cunning. Unlike his predecessors, Gilon warned the country's political leadership of the dangers inherent in extremist Jewish groups. He met with Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu to urge him to disassociate from these groups, and in an unusual step, even briefed the editors of Israel's newspapers on the issue.

Gilon resigned because of a one-time failure on that fateful night last November, the seeds of which had been sown years earlier in both philosophy and operation. Israelis have compared the breakdown to the flawed intelligence assessments that preceded the surprise attack of the 1973 Yom Kippur War. In both cases, a theoretical approach to the apparent dangers led to operational decisions that proved inadequate at the moment of crisis. In both cases, too, the result was a shakedown in the senior leadership of the IDF and the Shin Bet respectively.

But there are other similarities: 1973 represented the first crack in the wall of invincibility that had protected the IDF, especially since 1967. The intelligence failure and subsequent massive Arab attack led to a recognition by Israelis of the fallibility of the previously infallible. Many political observers saw 1973 as the beginning of an understanding of the limitations of military power on the one hand, and the development of a consensus for a political resolution to the conflict with Arab neighbors on the other hand. The IDF was no longer untouchable. Army reservist demonstrations during the 1982 Lebanon war, and later, growing public scrutiny of army operations and internal, fatal military accidents were natural consequences.

For the Shin Bet, 1995 will be viewed as a similar watershed year. Its successes in preventing terrorist attacks and in eliminating terrorists will be appreciated, even as its failure on Nov. 4 will be remembered. There will likely be greater scrutiny of its activities and the wall of secrecy will not be as impenetrable as in the past. The publicity given to Ayalon's appointment is symptomatic of this new attitude. Israelis would rather have a secret service they know more about, even at the expense of its halo of silence. The Shin Bet will have to continue to rehabilitate itself from within, and to prove its external capabilities in the face of new challenges and a changed reality.

Some observers view the demythologizing of the IDF and more recently, the Shin Bet, as part of a larger breakdown of historic symbols in the Israeli ethos. The military legends and prowess of the past, they argue, no longer command the same unstinting loyalty and support as they did at a time when the security of the collective was all-important. It is perhaps more appropriate to analyze the new transparency of old institutions as the inevitable result of the "individualization" of Israeli society and the power of a free, aggressive press.

Israelis may no longer "buy into" cliches and dogma as they did, and they may demand greater accountability where it never existed in the past. These are not necessarily negative developments. The commitment and loyalty of a younger generation will come from a base of greater knowledge, some skepticism and a sober realism.

A close look at the Knesset

As electioneering gets under way in the various political parties, the 13th Knesset enters its home stretch. Many of the members who grace the parliamentary dining room more often than they occupy the legislative chairs in the plenum will not be here after the ballots are counted, first in the party primaries and then at the national polls.

By Carl Alpert

The 13th Knesset has not overly distinguished itself. To the citizen who watches its operations via the daily television coverage, it has been marked not only by skimpy attendance but also by some rowdiness and much name-calling. Still, it should perhaps be judged in comparison to the Knesset which preceded it, when the Likud controlled the government. Some of the comparisons are instructive.

From a statistical abstract of Knesset operations thus far, we learn some interesting facts. When Yitzhak Shamir and Likud headed the majority coalition, the opposition parties, including Labor, sought to put spokes in the legislative process by filing and voting on no less than 132 motions of non confidence. In the same period of time in the present Knesset, Likud and the other opposition parties put forward only 91 non-confidence votes.

How much genuine business did this knesset actually transact during this period of approximately three-fourths of its life? The government put forward 202 resolutions, of which 149 were actually passed. On the other hand, private members of all parties proposed no less than 3,260 resolutions, of which only 168 were passed. Why the large number? Very simple: each proposer of a law gets an extra niche on the roster of speakers in addition to those allocated by his party. No matter that only 168 of the private members' bills were passed; the members all got time on the agenda to address the nearly empty chamber and to be recorded in the Knesset records.

Still, some of the legislation passed is of more than passing interest. Here are a few examples:

A new law provides for setting maximum profits to be made from the sale of pharmaceuticals.

A law already on the books provides that a civil servant must take action within three months on a request made of him by a citizen. This period has now been shortened to 45 days.

A bill presumably introduced by female members of the Knesset provides that the number of seats must be increased in all public women's washrooms.

All car owners must pay the annual radio licence fee, even if their cars do not have a radio.

Close relatives of one who fell during one of Israel's wars, may on the Yahrzeit day take a day off from work without being docked for the day.

Fax owners who have been receiving unwelcome messages will welcome new legislation which now makes it an offense to fax advertising material without the advance consent of the recipient.

Owners of business premises are forbidden to put up signs disclaiming responsibility for physical harm caused there.

Blind people accompanied by a seeing eye dog may take the dog with them into public places of entertainment without having to pay any extra admission fee.

Lobbyists, who have hitherto had an almost free hand swarming all over the Knesset building, will now be subjected to special regulations governing their admission.

Legislation on the books provides for strict segregation of the sexes in the prisons. A new law now makes it possible to bypass this restriction if it will in any way affect possible rehabilitation of the prisoner.

The government pays a special maternity grant to all mothers of newborn children. That law is now amended to provide that the grant be subject to income tax.

Austria begins to remember

Back in 1961, my wife and I had occasion to make an official visit to Germany.

I had been asked to make a survey of German educational literature, in order to assess the way in which German schools taught about the Jews and their fate. Travelling through many cities, I came away with the impression that German textbooks were on the whole trying to make students aware of what had happened during the Hitler days. There were pictures and descriptions of Kristallnacht, smashed shop windows, concentration camps and gas chambers. I could not evaluate how this material was being taught, but the information was certainly there.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

We ended our trip in southern Germany and thought that a week in Austria might be a good idea. We wanted to see whether the Austrians were on the same track as the Germans.

What we found was deeply disappointing; in fact, it was disgusting. Austrian educational authorities were quite clearly unwilling to admit that their country had any responsibility for what had happened to the Jews. It was all "the Nazis' fault." No word about their own enthusiastic reception of Hitler in 1938; no word about Hitler himself being an Austrian; no hint that Austrians had had any share in the atrocities that had been committed.

What did their textbooks say? Something like this: "From 1938 to 1945 we were occupied by the Germans, and terrible things happened." That was it, and that was the way Austrian education handled this subject for some years. It was a policy of total denial and, not surprisingly, anti-Semitism continued to flourish. None of the soul-searching that went on north of the border, and of course no reparation and restitution payments to Israel or any Austrian Jews. There was nothing to atone for, because nothing was supposed to have happened.

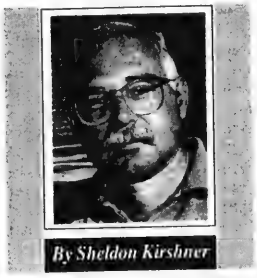
Not surprisingly, when it was discovered that Kurt Waldheim, erstwhile secretary general of the United Nations, had been a Nazi, Austrians were appalled — not at Waldheim, but at the accusation. Waldheim's denial was matched by the worthy citizens of his nation, who proceeded to elect him their president.

A recent evaluation of where Austrians stand today on these issues shows a significant change. In fact, an observer tells us, the very Waldheim affair broke the ice. For the first time, Austrians learned that Nazism was not a disease imposed on them by German conquerors; it was something of their own making as well. Witnesses came forward in the media who testified that Austrians had not just been tools in the hands of their masters, but partners in every way, and had in fact outdone the Germans in many respects. In 1991, Chancellor Franz Vranitzky stated that Austria shared responsibility for the Holocaust, and two years later, at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, he emphasized that Austrians had a responsibility not only to remember, but also to seek justice.

The Kirshner File

Jewish property claims on way to being settled

Negotiations have begun, to settle a matter which has pressed on the conscience of the world for decades. At long last, Jewish property and assets that were confiscated by the Nazis and the Communists may be returned to their rightful owners one day.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Worth billions of dollars, the property consists of synagogues, buildings which housed shuls, schools, libraries, hospitals and social clubs, as well as cemeteries.

For years after World War II, the issue lay virtually dormant, a ghost of the past. But with the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, it assumed a prominent place on the agenda of world Jewry.

"This is a hugely important, unfinished legacy of [the war]," Richard Holbrooke, a U.S. assistant secretary of state, said recently, voicing a widely-shared sentiment.

At the root of it all is theft, pure and simple. In countries occupied by Germany, the Nazi authorities, in league with local collaborators, dispossessed Jews of their belongings. The injustice was compounded by Communist regimes which nationalized all property.

During the Cold War, the matter was largely ignored. Even Israel let it lie, being loath to rock the boat. But as communism waned, attitudes changed. By the early 1990s, the World Jewish Congress was ready to deal with it in a forceful manner.

In July 1992, at the initiative of Congress president Edgar Bronfman, the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) was established to coordinate Jewish claims in Europe.

Mainly funded by the Jewish Agency in Israel, the WJRO is composed of eight bodies: World Jewish Congress, Jewish Agency, Claims Conference, American Joint Distribution Committee, World Zionist Organization, B'nai Brith International, Association of Holocaust Survivors in Israel and the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors.

The United States is fully behind the effort by the WJRO to resolve the problem through compensation or restitution.

President Bill Clinton, as well as Senator Jesse Helms, the chair of the foreign relations committee, have written letters of support to Bronfman.

The U.S. ambassador to the European Union, Stuart Eizenstat, has held discussions with East European officials.

Everyone recognizes that the recovery of Jewish property and assets in Eastern Europe will be a complicated and protracted affair.

The nations in contact with the WJRO have acknowledged their obligation to Jews. Last week, officials of five of these countries — Poland, Hungary, Romania, Slovakia and Estonia — released a statement in Jerusalem committing themselves to restitution.

However, these states are beset by enormous economic problems. The transition from a centralized Communist system to a free market economy has been extremely wrenching and costly and, not surprisingly, these governments have pleaded poverty.

The entire question is framed by the fear that the wholesale return of property may cause popular resentment and thereby exacerbate anti-Semitism in the region.

And, as observers have pointed out, it is clouded by internal disputes on the Jewish side concerning the true ownership of the spoils.

But before this conundrum can be resolved, the negotiations currently under way will have to be brought to a successful conclusion.

In concrete terms, relatively little has been achieved so far, according to Tony Lerman, director of the Institute of Jewish Affairs in London.

The record speaks for itself:

Poland — In May 1993, a WJRO delegation signed an agreement with Polish Jewish communities and secular organizations. Under the accord, the WJRO was given a mandate to reclaim communal, organizational and private heirless and unclaimed property.

At present, Poland is working on two basic restitution laws, according to Krzysztof Sliwinski, Poland's ambassador to the Diaspora, who visited Canada recently.

Once they have been approved by parliament, the Jewish community will be able to win back the following: cemeteries which were neither destroyed by the Nazis nor plowed under by the Communists to make way for roads and housing, 228 synagogues and 40 shtiebl buildings, 25 mikvahs, 27 schools, six orphanages, one old people's home, four hospitals, 22 community centres and five ritual slaughter facilities.

The communal property legislation will probably be enacted by this spring or summer. The legislation pertaining to private property should be passed within about a year.

Czech Republic — In April 1994, three years after adapting a restitution law, the government unveiled legislation which presages the return of confiscated property to their owners or heirs, provided they are citizens of the Czech Republic or live there permanently.

Czech Jews, however, have accused the government of deliberate delays in returning property and of downsizing the restitution package.

Slovakia — Restitution legislation, a model of its kind, was promulgated in January 1994. Many communal and private properties have been returned since then.

Hungary — Seven months ago, after lengthy and sometimes inconclusive discussions, the WJRO and the Hungarian government signed a pact under which the Ministry of Finance will establish two subcommittees to study the issue.

Romania — An agreement was signed last summer, but the WJRO is still in the process of submitting claims.

Ukraine — Almost three years ago, Ukraine became the first of the Soviet successor states to create a clear legal process for the restitution of properties. A number of buildings have been handed back, but bureaucratic obstructions prevent further progress.

Russia — Restitution legislation does not yet exist, but the authorities have returned some synagogues.

Bulgaria — A restitution law has been implemented and property has been restored to the Jewish community.

The Baltic states (Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia) — All three governments are amenable to restitution claims. Some property has been returned.

In Western Europe, the battle has only begun. The WJRO has amassed a wealth of documentation with respect to the confiscation of Jewish property in France, Belgium and Holland, and a flurry of claims can be expected.

Germany, of course, has paid out billions of dollars in compensation payments to Holocaust survivors since the 1950s. But of late, Bonn has closed the circle, having passed legislation enabling claimants to recover property in the former East Germany. Germany has also returned several communal buildings in Berlin and promises to act in thousands of similar cases.

In yet another development, Switzerland is finally coming clean with respect to frozen Jewish funds which have lain unclaimed in Swiss bank accounts for many years now. Under pressure, the Swiss Bankers Association has loosened regulations to facilitate claims by owners and heirs. Progress on this front will likely be slow, but the impasse has been broken.

Dealing with Israelis' concerns

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

During a recent visit to Israel, I participated in two conferences. The first, under the auspices of the Rabbi Joseph Kelman Educational Research Centre at Tel Aviv University, was a symposium on the significant issues confronting world Jewry, namely the universal hope that Jewish education will be a major factor in the search for Jewish identity for young people — in Israel and the Diaspora.

At first glance, it may seem that we should take it for granted, certainly in Israel. However, the question still remains: How do the secular Jewish young people express their identification? Does their Jewish education give them the knowledge and concrete ways of expressing the values they should learn at school and hopefully see at home? Living in Israel is not enough but they should see themselves as part of a historic process that includes the 2,000 years of Diaspora life. This subject is very much related to the search for continuity in North America.

The conference was really a seminar or think-tank of 12 educators from Israel, North America and Argentina. They discussed Jewish identity as something that could be expressed in religious forms through prayer, rituals and the study of Jewish texts. Others today express it through relationships to Israel, Hebrew language, the Holocaust and various components of Jewish culture, art and music.

There was a general consensus that even the schools in Israel must strengthen the teaching of traditional Jewish values. The discussions, questions and suggestions that came out of the symposium will be published and distributed to the Ministry of Education and Jewish Agency in Israel, as well as to educators throughout the world. Hopefully, it will lead to self-examination by people in the field of Jewish education and serve as an impetus for ongoing seminars in the future to implement new programs to ensure continuity and a sense of Jewish identity for Jews in Israel and the Diaspora.

I also had the opportunity to participate in the Rabbinical Israel Bond Conference with over 120 rabbis from North America, Mexico and Germany. We heard directly from Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu and other cabinet ministers, as they presented their views about the peace process, the most important issue in the Middle East today, as well as about the general political and economic situation in Israel today.

We heard directly from the Israeli minister of finance that the economy of Israel is very good. The inflation rate is the lowest in 26 years. Obviously there are differences of opinion about the concessions that the Israeli government has made and is willing to make to the PLO and Syria. There is a need for more dialogue between the left and right, the secular and religious, and Israel and the Diaspora.

In a way, the two conferences dealt with the two most important needs of Israel and world Jewry. The first one dealt with the ongoing concern for the spiritual welfare of the Jewish people; the Bond conference gave us additional insight into the realities of the hopes of the Israeli people for a meaningful and secure peace. It also strengthened the relationship of 120 rabbis with Israel; they, in turn, will relay the importance of Israel-Diaspora relations.

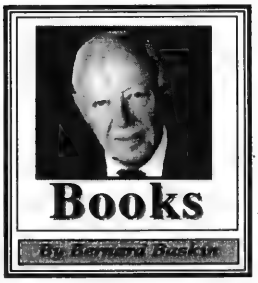
It is a two-way road we share in Israel's economic development by investing in Israel Bonds at a very respectable rate of interest. In turn, Israel can offer Diaspora Judaism spiritual values and identity.

The Peres government established a new cabinet committee on Israel-Diaspora relations, headed by the new minister and advisor to Peres, Rabbi Yehuda Amital, who went to Moscow after addressing both our conferences. His goal was to assure the Russian Jews that Israel is continuing to help Russian Jewry express itself in Jewish ways, something they could not do publicly until a few years ago.

Judaism and the Jewish people throughout the world can only benefit by strengthening the bonds between Israel and the Diaspora as strong partners since we share common goals and aspirations.

Rabbi Kelman is the spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Peres: ever the loyal soldier



Battling For Peace: A Memoir by Shimon Peres (Random House, $25 US).

This engrossing study traverses the author's 71 years and a political career that spans six decades of unswerving loyalty to his country.

Shimon Persky emigrated with his family from Poland to Palestine in 1934 when he was 10. He took a new name — Peres — the Hebrew word for the family of birds to which eagles belonged.

Bright, energetic, astute, a skilled diplomat and francophile, Peres, despite his age, was chosen by David Ben-Gurion in 1952 as director general of the Defence Ministry — the most important post in a highly-strategic department. During a parlous and uncertain period in Israel's early history he arranged valuable military purchases from France and other countries.

In time, he became the prime architect of Israel's military-industrial complex and creator of its Air Force.

Of absorbing interest is his account of how a chance for peace with Jordan a decade ago was thwarted by the caution of the American State Department after being warned by the Shamir government not to intervene in Israel's internal affairs.

In the light of his undeniable achievements why isn't Peres more popular and respected among his countrymen? Why is he regarded as superficial, mercurial and self-seeking? Perhaps, because in addition to his practical concerns he is an abstract thinker concerned with the future as much as the present.

A stubborn optimist he avers that "I have earned the right to dream. This book is my personal testimony to the fact that it is permissible for a man to dream — not just any dreams — but great dreams."

Today, Peres leads a nation divided and in turmoil, rent by political and religious schism and division. He must find healing for the nation's wounds, achieve peace with the Palestinians, and perhaps Syria, and assure Israel's progress and well-being.

He predicts a time when peace and prosperity will reign in the Middle East with Jews and Arabs working in tandem to create a model community. All persons of good will must say amen to this glorious vision of tomorrow.

Go ahead ... take a ride

TORONTO — A few years ago, a conference was held in Ottawa for survivors of the Holocaust and their children. Over the course of several days, many excellent speakers appeared and their talks were well received. But perhaps one of the most popular features of the conference was a bulletin board.

The place where people pinned their notes and their hopes trying to find word of relatives who had survived the Shoah.

A few were successful. Unfortunately, many were not.

Now, through advances in technology, there is a new kind of bulletin board out there that spans the entire world. Actually there are tens of thousands of electronic bulletin boards out there devoted to almost any topic imaginable.

For example, by using electronic bulletin boards devoted to the Holocaust [soc.culture.jewish.holocaust] and to Jewish genealogy [soc.genealogy.jewish], people can share information and conduct their searches for lost relatives around the world. And through the Internet's World Wide Web site "JewishGen: The Official Home of Jewish Genealogy" [http://www.jewishgen.org] they can have some of the best research available at their fingertips from anywhere, anytime.

Quite a leap from that solitary bulletin board in Ottawa.

This is only one small example of the power of the Information Highway.

Sure, that phrase has become a bit tiresome. But like it or not, the Information Highway is an accurate depiction of the revolution that has linked millions of computers. But more important, it has linked the millions of people sitting behind those computers.

And for a nation scattered to the four corners of the earth, this new technology presents a unique opportunity. Now we can meet...

...on "The Jewish Highway."

In this column, I want to take you to many places where you can:

- Track down old friends from your Jewish youth movement.
- Listen to newscasts from the same day's Kol Yisrael.
- Look up Kosher restaurants in Montreal.
- Debate the peace process.
- Or debate the very best recipe for gefilte fish.

You can already do all those things on the hundreds of Internet sites devoted to the Jewish people and the State of Israel. With more sites appearing every day.

As your tour guide, I will take you on a jargon-free trip along the Jewish lanes of the Internet. In order to come along for the ride, you will need a connection to the Internet and have a basic knowledge of a World Wide Web browser such as Netscape or Mosaic. (If you need help getting started, there are many excellent books available written in clear English. A favourite of mine is the Canadian Internet Handbook by Jim Carroll and Rick Broadhead.)

I do welcome your feedback especially if you have found an interesting new site. You can contact me at mdm@inforamp.net with your finds. In the next column, I'll talk about some great starting points for finding Jewish information on the Internet.

Breuchim haba'im to the Jewish highway. I hope you enjoy the journey.

P.S. Monday is Tu b'Shvat, the Jewish new year for trees. So here are some sites you might find interesting.

Dr. Nurit Reshef of Edmonton's Talmud Torah School has a tale for Tu b'Shvat at [http://www.ualberta.ca/~yreshef/tuintro.htm]. Pay attention!

There's a quiz, too.

If Tu b'Shvat puts you in an environmental frame of mind, check out "HOLIT, Hebrew University's Environmental Online Information System" at [http://www1.huji.ac.il/www_teva/] This is a large database for environmental information in Israel and around the world. Be warned, a lot of the information seems quite technical, there are no graphics and some areas are in Hebrew only.

And if you want to do something off the beaten path on your next trip to Israel, take a look at the nature trips available from The Society For The Protection Of Nature In Israel. [http://www.macom.co.il/nature/index.html]. Happy Holiday.

Dead Sea Scrolls hold no real secrets: scholar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Lawrence Schiffman

Part of the excavations at Qumran

TORONTO —Contrary to popular myth, the Dead Sea Scrolls will not provide any startling revelations about either Judaism or Christianity, asserts a leading expert on the subject.

Dr. Lawrence Schiffman, a professor of Hebrew and Judaic Studies at New York University, is one of a consortium of scholars involved in publishing the Dead Sea Scrolls.

This year, he is Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Professor in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto. He is teaching an undergraduate course on the Scrolls, as well as giving a series of public lectures.

Many people are expecting them to prove or disprove their own and other religious beliefs, Schiffman told The CJN in an interview in his temporary office at the Centre for Religious Studies.

Carbon 14 dating, however, proved that all the material was composed before the rise of Christianity and therefore can't give any direct reference to it.

For Jews, he said, it only proves that the Bible as we know it today had been set by the time the Scrolls were gathered together, between 300 BCE and the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE.

What they do do, Schiffman said, is to "illuminate the tremendous richness of debate in the Jewish community [at that time]."

After the Maccabean revolt, which ended with the establishment of the Maccabean kingdom in 152 BCE, there was extensive debate on the nature of Judaism, he said.

These debates Schiffman said, were not over issues like assimilation.

"These were arguments between Sabbath observant, kashrut observing Jews, who held strong differences of opinion about theological beliefs and Jewish law."

Thanks to the scrolls, we know what Judaism was like before Christianity and how the Jewish sects of the time must have influenced the development of the new religion. They also allow scholars to trace what happened between the time of final shaping of the Bible and that of writing of the Mishnah.

For Christians, Schiffman believes, "the more the Scrolls authenticate the wide debate in Judaism, the more they can see themselves as a sect. When Christians are educated to understand themselves as having emerged from Judaism, this lessens anti-Semitism."

Schiffman acknowledges that there is a great deal of misconception about the material among non-scholars. One tabloid, he said with a twinkle, even claimed that Elvis was mentioned in one of them.

The story of the scrolls, material probably collected and copied by a somewhat obscure sect called the Essenes, are the stuff of Hollywood movies. Discovered in 1947 by Bedouins in a series of caves in Qumran in the Judean desert, the 80,000 pieces of text were eventually combined into about 1,200 larger plates, kept first under glass and now, to preserve them properly, between sheets of rice paper.

It was not until the 1980s that the material began to be widely circulated and studied, with the whole thing available on microfiche.

Efforts now are centering around making sure the reconstruction is accurate (many letters are fragmented and it is not always certain which bits go together) and in interpreting and understanding the content.

Schiffman explained that the scrolls consist of Tanach, the Chumash, Prophets and Writings we know today (except for the Book of Esther); apocryphal texts, additions to the Bible which have also been found in other excavations, such as Masada. About one-third of the material has never been previously known.

Provincial budget cuts threaten survival of Jewish agencies

Michael Scheinert

By Howard English

Toronto's Jewish agencies are bracing for even worse news than they have already received because of government budget cuts.

There were predictions of a rougher ride ahead at a recent meeting of agency presidents and executives, sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"The gun is loaded and the trigger is going to be pulled whether it's in three months or six months," warned Morris Zbar, Director of the Federation's Community Planning & Allocations Department.

Senior Care Executive Director Michael Scheinert suggested that some agencies may not survive as independent entities. "The fact that we've been around for 75 or 100 years does not guarantee that we will be around in the next 10 years," he said. Scheinert's analysis was confirmed by Community Planning & Allocations Chairman Alan Sandler who advised the agency heads to think about major change. "The Federation will not be able to raise sufficient money to make up for what the government is cutting," he added.

Jewish service agencies have been badly bruised by government spending reductions at all levels. Jewish Family & Child Service is being forced to close the Jerome Diamond Centre for troubled teens. It is also losing other programs, including one which counsels clients on government social assistance.

JF&CS Executive Director Gordon Wolfe believes that counselling for abused women is at risk because it may not be viewed by the province as a core service. He is also worried about the government's commitment to service delivery by Jewish agencies, rather than through amalgamated organizations.

Metro Toronto, which can expect about $220 million less from Queen's Park, has already notified recipients of community grants to expect less as well. "Fewer agencies will be funded," explained Bernard Betel Centre Executive Director, Esta Wahl. "An agency can no longer assume funding."

The Federation's Zbar reminded participants of a $3 billion dollar reduction in federal transfer payments. "If Ottawa maintains the same formula," he noted, "there will be no transfer payments to the provinces in 10 years."

According to Zbar, the Jewish community must identify its most essential services, because "the Federation will not be in a position to fund all of them."

Sandler sees the need for "very close cooperation among the agencies and between the agencies and Federation."

"It's a changed world," he observed. "It's not the same game as it was before."

Economist questions tax cuts at UJA forum

Get spending under control first. Then worry about tax breaks. That's the advice from the Bank of Nova Scotia's Senior Chief Economist, Dr. Warren Jestin, who spoke last week to members of UJA's Young Construction Network.

Jestin took issue with the Ontario Conservative party promise of a 30% tax cut. "The arithmetic doesn't add up," he said. "I don't think that reducing taxes a little for the average household will ignite consumer spending."

Jestin believes the provincial government should adopt the Alberta strategy of first reducing the deficit, then "holding out lower taxes as a goal."

However, Jestin, who is a strong proponent of government budget cutting at all levels, offered a stark analysis of federal debt. "Canada, on a per capita basis," he noted," is the most indebted country in the world to foreign investors. We have to borrow $15 billion a year to pay back $40 billion in interest." Despite federal spending levels dropping by 6% a year, "$8-10 that the government was able to cut was eroded by debt service costs."

Among Jestin's other observations:

- Toronto is going to benefit "big time" this year from tourism.
- Interest rates will go down by 1/4 - 1/2% in the first half of the year before picking up in the second half.
- The value of the Canadian dollar will be 72-74 cents U.S.
- The average price of a home in the Greater Toronto Area will be under $200,000.
- The number of 45-65 year olds in Canada by the year 2,000 will be ten times what it is today.

UJA's Young Construction Network brings together 25-40 year old men and women in the real estate, development and construction industries.

Mission 3000 ready for take off

The countdown to Mission 3000 has begun. Less than three weeks are left before more than 1100 participants from across Canada embark on what promises to be the trip of a lifetime to Israel.

It's a nine day mission sponsored by UJA and United Israel Appeal, coinciding with Jerusalem 3000 celebrations.

Herb Rosenfeld, who is co-chairing Mission 3000 with Rosanne Ain, is looking forward to "1100 Canadian Jews standing strong to celebrate the birthday of a city which is the heart of the Jewish people."

Nearly 200 mission participants from Toronto and other surrounding communities have never visited Israel before. Many are planning to extend their stays beyond the mission's conclusion to see more of the country.

Mother-daughter team Ruth Richler (left) and Sheila Lancit are preparing for an unprecedented mission.

Mission highlights include meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, shabbat dinner at Jerusalem's Great Synagogue, a gala concert in Jerusalem, opening ceremonies in Metulla at Canada Centre's new Olympic ice rink and a closing dinner in Eilat.

Mission members are even bringing along used hockey equipment for Canada Centre, children's books that will be donated to Israeli libraries and other gifts.

A tribute to a tireless leader

A little over a month ago, Toronto's Jewish community lost one of its best. To mark the end of shloshim for Phil Granovsky, Community Matters contributing editor, Adi Waksman, prepared this tribute from those who knew him well.

Phil Granovsky

If ever there was one man who exemplified loyalty to his community, it was Phil Granovsky. The dedicated community leader died from leukemia on December 24, 1995 at age 74. He left behind a legacy of vision and generosity to which those who knew him well are paying tribute.

Granovsky, who came to Canada from Romania when he was 5, grew up in the College and Bathurst area and never forgot his Jewish roots. His business success as the founder of Atlantic Packaging Products Ltd. was mirrored in a distinguished career of community service which continued until his death.

Granovsky was a former UJA Campaign Chairman and one of the co-chairs of Operation Exodus. Steve Ain, the Executive Vice-President of United Israel Appeal, Canada, remembers Granovsky as a man of "incredible determination".

"His was the first million dollar annual gift to UJA," Ain recalled. "He single-handedly raised the level of giving in the Toronto campaign by his example."

Granovsky was also very active with Keren Hayesod serving as World Chair and Chairman of the Board of Trustees from 1979-1985 and 1987-1992.

"He was respected by world leadership and his wife Shirley has received numerous letters of condolence from many different countries," noted Julia Koschitzky, who currently heads the Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees.

Dr. Gerry Halbert, a friend of Granovsky for 40 years, called him "one of our foremost community leaders." According to Halbert and many others, Granovsky continued his community work throughout his long illness. "His drive and determination," said Halbert, "were legendary."

Students remember Rabin

CZF joins UJA on Community March day

Jeff Cohen and Maura Cooperberg are back this year to chair UJA's Community March for Israel.

Mark May 26 on your calendar. That's the date for this year's UJA Community March for Israel and the Jerusalem 3000 Festival that follows.

For the first time, the festival will be a joint United Jewish Appeal-Canadian Zionist Federation project.

According to CZF coordinator Tillie Margolis, the two organizations are joining forces for the festival in order to demonstrate "the significance of a united Jerusalem." The festival, she stressed, will last long after the march ends. "We're planning a wonderful event for marchers and non-marchers alike," she said.

This year's march, called Journey to Jerusalem, and the festival are dedicated to Jerusalem 3000, marking the 3000th year since King David designated the city as Israel's capital.

The march will begin at the Promenade Shopping Centre and end at the North York Centennial Centre on Finch, west of Bathurst, this year's new festival location.

UJA's Maura Cooperberg, who is co-chairing the march with Jeff Cohen, considers the Centennial Centre a "bonus" as the festival site. "It permits a fun-filled day rain or shine," she said.

Last year, despite pouring rain, 2,000 marchers turned out. The year before, some 7,000 people participated on a warm, sunny day.

Proceeds from the march, which is UJA's single largest event, benefit children in Israel.

Gifts keep coming from UJA's Tzedakah All Stars

Hundreds of Jewish kids are demonstrating how much they care to share.

More than 500 presents have already been donated for distribution to underprivileged children all over Toronto, thanks to UJA's growing Tzedakah All Star Team.

The Tzedakah All Star program encourages kids to drop off an unwrapped gift they've received at one of the 9 Tzedakah All Star boxes located in schools and at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The response to the All Star team, which has been up and running since December, has been "tremendous," according to chairperson and founder Elizabeth Erlich.

Erlich is pleased with "the excellent network of parents and volunteers" working on the year round project, which she considers "a great vehicle for teaching the concept of tzedakah to kids."

Eight year old Noah Turk, a grade 3 student at Netivot Hatorah Day School, has also caught the Tzedakah bug. He donated $5 to the All Star effort because he didn't have a gift to give.

"Noah wanted to do something, but his birthday isn't until July," his mother Elizabeth explained. "So we counted the money in his piggy bank and he brought the donation directly to his school."

Florence Weinberger of Jewish Family and Child Service, which distributes the presents, is happy that "hundreds of smiling kids are getting them."

Tzedakah All Star donors automatically become members of the Junior UJA Club, entitling them to participation in parties and other events.

The Tzedakah All Star program is the only one of its kind in North America.

Society supports Project Renewal school

The Wierzbniker Mutual Benefit Society, one of Toronto's oldest, celebrated its 60th anniversary last year with a large contribution to the Rambam School in Beit Dagan. The Israeli town is one of three regions assisted by UJA's Project Renewal program. Project Renewal helped Beit Dagan become an attractive community from a troubled development town.

Holding a cheque designated for the school is Wierzbniker President Howard Kleinberg beside Vice President Howard Chandler and Abe Zukerman, the Society's UJA Chairman.

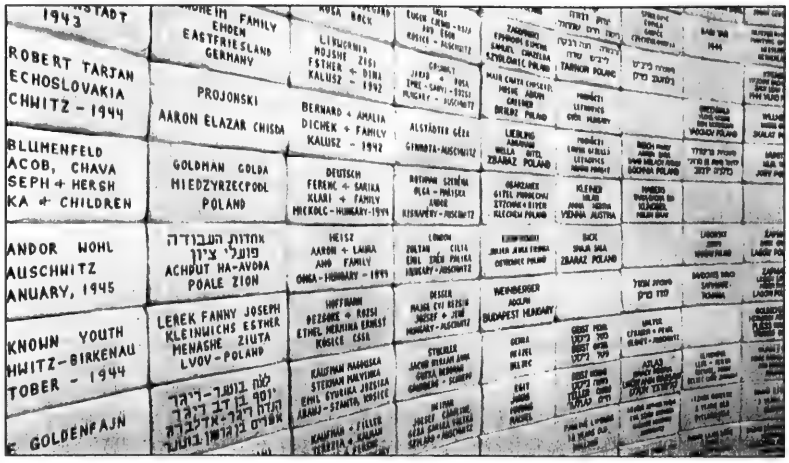
New Holocaust Resource Centre



The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre is expanding its wall of tiles.

With 1,000 books, a web site and access to the internet for visiting researchers, Toronto's new Holocaust Resource Centre will be officially unveiled on February 18. An open house, featuring former Ontario premier Bob Rae, will be taking place from 1-5 p.m. at 4600 Bathurst Street, the resource centre's location.

"Anything that deals with the Holocaust can be found here," says Pnina Zilberman, Director of the Federation's Holocaust Educational and Memorial Centre, which is celebrating its 10th anniversary this year.

The new Holocaust Resource Centre's library will feature volumes on genealogy, history, memoirs and yizkor books, produced by Jewish organizations.

The centre's hi-tech, multi-media equipment will serve the entire community including journalists, students and educators.

Eleanor Getzler, chair of the Holocaust Education Committee, is pleased with how much the Centre has grown in the last 10 years. "We really have become an integral part of the community and an important player in spreading information about the Holocaust," she said.

The Holocaust Memorial Centre is also in the midst of a tile campaign with a quickly approaching deadline.

Relatives and friends of Jews who perished during the Holocaust have until March 1 to submit the names of their loved ones. Each name will be engraved on a tile and added to a thousand others already on the wall at the Centre. A special unveiling ceremony marking the completion of the campaign will take place on April 21.

Federation invites graduates to Reisman reunion

By Adi Waksman

The guru of education for Jewish communal professionals is coming to Toronto later this month. And Bernie Reisman is not surprised that so many of his former students chose to live and work in Toronto's Jewish community. Reisman, who is the founding director of the Hornstein Program in Jewish Communal Service at Brandeis University, sees our city as a "magnet for young people."

"Toronto has more professional opportunities, higher professional standards and more social life for young Jews," he noted "than many other cities in North America."

Reisman will be meeting many of his former students at an alumni reunion on February 19. His two day stay, starting the day before, will include a public lecture and talks to UJA/Federation professionals.

Reisman, who still teaches full time, is very proud of the world renowned reputation of the 25 year old Hornstein program. He considers it "unique" for a university to have a department devoted entirely to the study of Jewish communal work. Students earn a Masters degree after two years and graduate with specialized skills in, among other subjects, fundraising and mobilizing volunteers to work with professionals.

David Gotfrid, Hornstein Grad

Zac Kaye, the Federation's Director of Jewish Campus Services, a graduate of the Hornstein program, recalls Reisman's "tremendous insight and ability to plant seeds in his students' minds."

Judith Urbach, who worked for the United Way and Reena Foundation after she graduated in 1987, considers Reisman "a visionary."

David Gotfrid is still using some of the people skills Reisman taught him even though he no longer works in community service. "Ever since I opened my business 4 years ago, I've been building a community among my staff," explained Gotfrid who plans to attend the reunion.

Hornstein alumni, interested in the reunion, should call Mara Koven at (416) 631-5728 for more information.

Reform leader to speak out on Torah, Israel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A stirring message to place Torah at the centre of Jewish life was delivered here recently by the leader of the Reform movement in Canada and the United States.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, who takes over as president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) in July, also said Reform will challenge the claim of some Orthodox groups that they represent the Torah position against giving up land in Israel.

"We've all been too quiet on this, including you in Canada," he said.

Rabbi Yoffie succeeds Rabbi Alexander Schindler, who has ben UAHC president for 23 years.

Since Israel is now a "rich country," Rabbi Yoffie said money donated to Israel from Diaspora Reform Jews should be directed to strengthening Judaism in that country. "But this does not mean, God forbid, that we should turn our backs on Israel," he said.

Rabbi Yoffie gave a far-ranging review of Reform policy at a Town Hall meeting with rabbinic and lay leaders of the movement at Holy Blossom Temple recently.

The meeting broke into applause when Rabbi Gunther Plaut declared: "There is more than one interpretation of Torah. We don't want to leave the debate to Orthodox spokesmen. We must involve ourselves in the religious debate as well as the political debate."

The UAHC president commented in reply: "I agree 100 percent."

Responding to a question on how Jews can be motivated to donate to Israel if the economic urgency no longer exists, Rabbi Yoffie said it is a complex matter, fraught with difficulty. "We are walking a tightrope. Above all, we cannot say not to give to Israel."

He maintained that since the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin and given the evidence that the peace process will likely succeed, it is clear that "religious issues" are paramount in Israel today. Whatever Reform Jews can do to strengthen Judaism in Israel will also strengthen Judaism in the Diaspora, he said.

To this end, Rabbi Yoffie said Reform must seek alliances with other groups "to break the monopoly of Orthodoxy in Israel."

In reply to another question, the UAHC president said the Reform movement is not abandoning its championing of social justice or its insistence on equality for men and women, a pluralist society and "reaching out to intermarrieds and others on the fringe."

Rabbi Yoffie said he hopes prayers in Reform synagogues will be revitalized and updated "and that we will define our goals in terms of Torah."

Israel has done so well economically that it has more companies on the New York stock exchange than any other country except Canada, Rabbi Yoffie said.

But Jews must be challenged to support Jewish causes in other ways. Baby boomers are among those asking, "What's in Judaism for me?" he said, declaring that the recent trend to give more money raised by the United Jewish Appeal to local needs is a healthy one.

He claimed that anti-Semitism, job discrimination, education and housing restrictions are no longer obstacles facing Jews.

סבתר במרתף - עמוס עוז חדש

ספר חדש של עמוס עוז הוא תמיד אירוע מרגש. תחשבו על זה: שנתיים תמימות מחכים מיליוני ישראלים שהאיש הזה ימתיק את חייהם בספר חדש! ברבות השנים - הלכה וגדלה הביקורת של מבקרי הספרות על כל מיני אלמנטים בכתיבה של עמוס עוז: למה הוא כותב ככה ואומר ככה. אבל הכל שטויות - הוא כותב נפלא, וקונים את ספריו במאות אלפים לא רק בישראל אלא בכל העולם.

הפעם - העונג היה אמיתי. קראתי לאט לאט, בתקווה שלא ייגמר עלי מהר מידי. "פנתר במרתף" הוגדר על ידי המבקרים כ"ספר נעורים"- רוצה לומר ספר לילדים. האירוע שמתואר בספר קורה לפני קום המדינה ואני בספק אם ילדי הטלביזיה והניינטנדו יסכימו להתמודד עם הכתיבה האיטית, השקולה, הבלתי חברמנית שלו. האמת היא שזהו ספר למי שהיו ילדים בשנות הארבעים והחמישים. אתם תרגישו ממש בבית, ולי בכל אופן הוא גרם התרגשות רבה וגעגועים לילדותי. כדי לתת לכם טעם טוב, הינה מספר קטעים קצרים:

"לירדנה היה ארוס, והיה ארוס לשעבר, ומלבדם, אמרו, יש גם צייד מהגליל ומשורר מהר הצופים וגם המעריץ הביישן שרק מסתכל בה בעצם ואף פעם לא מעז להגיד לה, מלבד בוקר טוב ותראי איזה יום נהדר. בתורף נתתי לירדנה לקרוא שני שירים ואחרי כמה ימים אמרה, אתה כנראה תכתוב עוד. המילים האלה נפלאו לי יותר מרוב המילים שבאו כעבור שנים, כשבאמת כתבתי".

ואחרון חביב: "החזקתי אז בהשקפה שגיעית בת בבן משפילה את כבודו של הבן. בנגיעת בן בבת, לעומת זאת, ראיתי מעשה גבורה שיכול להתרחש אולי רק בחלום. או בסרטים. ואם אירע בחלום מוטב לא לזכור".

אהבתי בספר הזה הכל: השפה, חוש ההומור, העלילה, אבל מעל הכל אני מעריץ אותו על הריסון העצום שלו: אין לו שום בעיה לספר "עלילה מוֹתֶחת", אם הוא רוצה, כמו א.ב. יהושע או מאיר שלו. אבל לא עמוס עוז! הוא לא יתפתה לעלילה עוצרת נשימה אם הוא מרגיש שהדברים לא היו צריכים להיות עוצרי נשימה.פנקו את עצמכם עם "פנתר במרתף"! מגיע לכם! אבל שישאר בינינו.

מקום מדליק בירושלים:

אם יוצא לכם לבקר בארץ ואתם מגיעים לירושלים ובא לכם לראות משהוא באמת מדהים - תלכו לראות את בית המשפט העליון החדש. זהו מבנה שסמוך למשכן הכנסת ולמשרדי הממשלה, ובו נערכת כל הפעילות של בית המשפט העליון. האדריכלים (כמו המון אחרים שבנו בירושלים) קיבלו כאן השראה שהחזירה אותם לימי התנ"ך ובית שני. יש לך הרגשה שאתה מסתובב במבנה מתקופה קדומה. הכל שַׁיִש, קשתות, אבני ירושלים מסוּתָתות. תדרי הדיונים, הספריה, החצר, הכל בנוי ממש בתחושת קדושה. יצא לי אפילו להיכנס לדיון ולראות את נשיא בית המשפט, פרופ. ברק ושניים מעמיתיו מאזינים לטיעוניה של עורכת דין במשפט חוזי כלשהוא. אין מה לעשות - ירושלים עושה לאנשים טראנספורמציה ומוציאה מהם כוחות בלתי ידועים ואת מיטב ההשראה. כדאי לכם לנסוע - הסיבוב לוקח אולי עשרים דקות אבל שווה כל שניה.

כמה אתה עושה בחודש? איפה עשיתם את ליל הסדר? איפה היית בצבא? אולי יש לך סיגריה? איפה אתה במילואים? למה אף אחד לא עומד בתור? יש לך אולי פרוטקציה שם? מי קפה ומי תה?

Teens lobby to move embassy

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

WINDSOR — A group of Windsor teenagers has embarked on an ambitious project it hopes will snowball into a national Jewish campaign: getting Canada to move its embassy in Israel to Jerusalem.

The recently-formed Canadian Israel Public Affairs Committee (CIPAC) hopes that the United States' plan to move its embassy to Jerusalem by 1999 will embolden Ottawa to do the same.

The group is an outgrowth of Herzl AZA 112, a chapter of the B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) in Windsor, and has about 20 members, all under age 18.

Its goal, according to its two-page manifesto, A Vision of Jewish Unity, is to get the Canadian Embassy relocated from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, thus recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's "undisputed" capital in this, the city's 3,000th birthday. It also hopes to unite Canada's Jewish community around the issue.

Only El Salvador and Costa Rica currently maintain embassies in Jerusalem. All other nations, including Canada, have regarded the city as disputed since 1967, when Israeli troops captured Arab East Jerusalem and reunited the city.

The group has undertaken a letter-writing campaign to local MPs, including Solicitor General Herb Gray, and then Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet.

It hopes national Jewish advocacy groups will come aboard to pressure Ottawa. The group has the blessing of the Canada-Israel Committee and BBYO.

But so far, the pressure seems to have had little effect.

Just after the U.S. Congress passed a bill last fall to move Washington's embassy by May 1999, Ouellet criticized the move as an "inappropriate" bid to influence Jerusalem's final status.

He said much the same thing in a December letter to CIPAC, saying it is important "to refrain from activities that would prejudge the outcome" of negotiations on Jerusalem. "I have therefore concluded that it would be inappropriate for Canada to take any action at this time to relocate our embassy to Jerusalem."

Talks on all land occupied by Israel in 1967, including Jerusalem, are slated to begin this May.

CIPAC chair Aaron Lazarus, a Grade 12 student at Vincent Massey High School, told The CJN his BBYO group was spurred to action following a visit to Israel last summer, when the teens befriended an employee of AIPAC, the mighty American Israel lobby.

"We thought if the United States could do it, why not Canada?" Lazarus said he's "discouraged that Ottawa seems to have made up its mind. But we'll keep trying."

Canadians are not unfamiliar with the sensitivities of moving their embassy in Israel. In 1979, then Tory leader Joe Clark promised to move the mission to Jerusalem, only to suspend plans as prime minister following an outcry from Arab groups. In what became a debacle, Clark backed down completely after a report from former Tory leader Robert Stanfield urged Canada not to move its embassy to Jerusalem.

But as the fledgling group says, optimistically, "We can get the embassy moved, one letter at a time."

CIPAC may be reached at 519-972-6635.

Cantorial concert set for Kelowna

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — Cantor Murray Nixon of Beth Israel Synagogue in Vancouver will be featured in a cantorial concert at the Kelowna Community Theatre on the evening of March 26.

The concert is under the sponsorship of the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) in cooperation with the Pacific region of the Jewish National Fund. Proceeds will aid the amphitheatre project to be built in Jerusalem by the Jewish National Fund as its gift to Jerusalem 3000.

The cantor will be accompanied by local pianist Kaye Patterson.

Honorary patrons of the event are longtime friends of the OJC and former Negev Dinner honorees, MLA Cliff Serwa and his wife Lois.

The program will include songs of Israel in Hebrew and Yiddish. Also on the program will be a short review of the current situation in Israel by Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs, the Jewish National Fund's shaliach in the region.

Tickets are now available from Mel Kotler and Larry Teale in Kelowna or any member of the OJC, as well as the Towne Ticket Centre.

Put More Money In Your Pocket.

Borrowing Your RSP Contribution Can Actually SAVE You Money.

One of the few remaining ways Canadians can reduce the income tax they pay is by making contributions to an RSP. However, few of us have the cash required to make our maximum contribution.

By borrowing your maximum contribution, you can lower the amount of tax you pay now, and actually keep more of your hard earned money. Consider the following example.

John, age 30, has a maximum RSP contribution limit of $8,100. So far, he's only been able to save $2,100. Let's consider the benefits of John borrowing the additional $6,000 he needs to reach his limit.

Scenario #1

John decides not to borrow, leaving his total 1995 RSP contribution amount at $2,100. Assuming his combined federal and provincial tax rate is about 42%, his tax savings would be $882 (42% x $2,100). If his $2,100 RSP investment earns 10% per year over 25 years, it will grow to $23,000.

Scenario #2

John borrows the additional $6,000 to reach his goal of making his maximum contribution of $8,100. At his combined tax rate of 42%, his tax savings will be $3,402. If he receives this as a tax refund, he can reduce his loan immediately to $2,598.

$6,000	original amount borrowed
$3,402	less his tax refund amount applied to the loan
$2,598	new loan balance

John has also made a big difference in the value of his savings for his retirement years. By borrowing the $6,000 required to make his maximum contribution, John's $8,100 contribution, earning 10%, will have grown to $88,000 at age 55. That's $65,000 more than if he only contributed $2,100! That's the power of borrowing your maximum contribution.

We'll prepare an RSP loan for you in twenty minutes. Visit your local branch for more details.

Amir not representative of Bar-Ilan: Eckstein

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

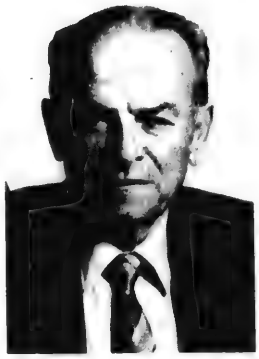
MONTREAL — Slowly but surely, the campus of Bar-Ilan University is returning to a semblance of normalcy, according to its outgoing president.

Prof. Shlomo Eckstein said in an interview with The CJN, that he has spent three nightmarish months defending his university against charges of being a hotbed for radical right activities.

"There was a definite search for a scapegoat, some of it malicious, by the media," says Eckstein, after it came out that Yitzhak Rabin's confessed assassin, Yigal Amir, was a Bar-Ilan law student.

Literally within hours of the assassination, recalled Eckstein during a recent visit to Montreal, hordes of media descended on Bar-Ilan. They churned out stories that portrayed the university — and especially its Institute for Advanced Torah Studies — as a centre for radical right thinking.

To Eckstein, such vilification was extremely painful since the 40-year-old Bar-Ilan's very foundations, ironically enough, were built upon the principle of the Orthodox and secular worlds coexisting in harmony and mutual tolerance.



Prof. Shlomo Eckstein

He noted that for this reason, Bar-Ilan has never allowed political party activity on campus. If a partisan political poster was discovered on campus, it was immediately removed. The Torah studies centre also does not allow political activities.

"But Yigal Amir could have been a student at any of Israel's universities," Eckstein said. "He just happened to go to Bar-Ilan."

In the days and weeks and months since the assassination and prior to his retirement as president, Eckstein said, his time has been spent trying to repair the damage done to the university's image and reputation.

First, the university, itself in a state of shock because a Bar-Ilan student murdered Rabin, immediately condemned the act in the strongest possible terms, stressing it went against every Jewish religious and Zionist principle the university was built upon.

The university then began organizing a series of seminars and symposiums on issues related to religious fanaticism and Jewish values, which have continued to this day.

Bar-Ilan, Eckstein said, will continue on this course. One idea is to implement a mandatory course in democracy for all students. Bar-Ilan also announced the establishment of a "mega-centre" in Rabin's name for the promotion of unity, democracy, and tolerance.

Asked if such a high number of activities might make it appear as if the university was reacting overly defensively to the accusations made against it, Eckstein did not dismiss the point.

But he insisted that concrete gestures were absolutely necessary in order to remind the world of what Bar-Ilan has always stood for.

Eckstein is firm in his belief that Bar-Ilan will not suffer permanent damage as a result of the negative publicity generated by the assassination.

Bar-Ilan, he said, was one of Israel's universities closest to Rabin's heart.

Exhibit honors Japanese envoy

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Hundreds of Vancouver residents are visiting the Holocaust Education Centre here to pay tribute to a Japanese diplomat who, by defying his government, saved the lives of more than 6,000 European Jews during the Holocaust.

A photographic exhibit tells the story of Chiune Sugihara and his family who, without Japan's authority, approved visas for Polish Jews fleeing Europe via Lithuania, just ahead of the Nazis.

Sugihara, who operated a one-man consulate in Kaunas in Soviet-occupied Lithuania, died in Japan in 1985, a disgraced man. He had been dismissed from the foreign service and was working in a warehouse.

But in a book about him by his wife, Yukiko, who encouraged him in saving the Jews, he is quoted as having said, "I may have disobeyed my government but if I didn't I would be disobeying God."

Through a complicated arrangement, Sugihara stamped exit visas for refugees who had been approved by the acting Dutch consul for entry into the Dutch Caribbean islands of Curacao and Surinam. The occupying Russians in Lithuania agreed to let the refugees out, as long as the Japanese approved, and thus Sugihara became involved.

All foreign consuls were kicked out of Lithuania by the Soviets and the last family to get Sugihara's stamp of approval included Nadia Kaplan, originally from Germany, who now lives in Vancouver. Her husband raced after Sugihara's car, which was just leaving Kaunas and managed to get his visa stamped to cover the whole family.

Another Vancouver resident, Susan Bluman, who was then 19, and her young husband, came to Vancouver thanks to the Japanese consul's help.

Sugihara was recognized by Yad Vashem in 1985 as a Righteous Gentile.

The exhibit, called Visas for Life, includes about 65 photos and artifacts from the Sugihara family collection. It was developed in San Francisco and has been seen so far in New York and Seattle. Vancouver is the first Canadian city to show it.

Frieda Miller, education coordinator of the Holocaust Centre, told The CJN the exhibit is helping cement relations between Vancouver's Japanese and Jewish communities.

The exhibit opened Jan. 15 and runs until March 29.

Yeshivah geared for women

MONTREAL — Normally, the head of an Orthodox yeshivah from Jerusalem coming to town to recruit students would not make news.

But this particular yeshivah was founded by a woman, caters to women and is taught by women.

Holly Pavlov, 46, founded the She'arim (Hebrew for gates) Yeshivah in Jerusalem only 16 months ago, and says it has spurred unusual interest for its unique, "holistic" approach to connecting Jewish women to their religion and to the Jewish texts.

While not the first yeshivah in Jerusalem to have female students — there are five in all, she said — Pavlov says that hers is the first to use the above approach and to hire an almost all-female staff.

The school's slogan is: Where educated women educate women.

"This yeshivah allows women to learn that they wield a certain intellectual and religious power and strength they might otherwise not know about," says Pavlov, who moved to Israel in 1983 with her husband from her native Silver Spring, Md.

While faithful to the Orthodox belief that women should play different — but not inferior — roles to men, Pavlov's yeshivah is patterned after men's in the sense that women study Chumash in pairs, a first for a yeshivah of its kind, she said.

Torontonian trying to restore Warsaw cemetery

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michael Horowitz, in a quest for his roots, has vowed to save a 182-year-old cemetery in Warsaw, Poland.

The Okopowa Street Jewish Cemetery lay in the shadow of the legendary Warsaw Ghetto.

"It's a miracle that the cemetery is still there," said Horowitz, 25, son of Bonnie and Harvey Horowitz of Toronto.

The 75-acre cemetery, which has 150,000 graves, is overrun with trees and parts of it are inaccessible. A solitary Jewish caretaker, Boleslaw Szenicer, 47, is doing his best to record the names which are still legible on the gravestones. Many of the monuments are cracked and weatherbeaten or have toppled over.

Despite this, Horowitz, a management consultant based in the Brussels office of Deloitte and Touche, is convinced that with updated technology and professional help — which he is willing to give — names of the Jews buried there can be rescued.

It was the Toronto man's interest in his own Polish forbearers — his grandparents come from Czestochowa and Ostrowiec — that led him to the Warsaw cemetery.

Michael Horowitz

An official tour in December of the small Jewish community in Warsaw and of the cemetery left him dissatisfied and he went back for a private talk with caretaker Szenicer.

Though he was not able to find any of his own relatives in the incomplete records, he became convinced that the cemetery can give up its secrets.

"All that's needed is a good data base and some restoration projects. We're not talking about an exorbitant amount of money," he told The CJN. "I'm going to see this project through."

Horowitz was also fired up by the caretaker's determination and quiet dedication. Szenicer's father, Pinkus, discovered the decrepit and abandoned cemetery in 1960 and volunteered to look after it. When Pinkus died in 1983, his son, then 31, gave up his job as a chef, along with any thoughts of emigration, and devoted himself to finishing his father's work.

The Warsaw Jewish community and other agencies provide about $10,000 a year for restoration and record-keeping, an amount Horowitz says falls far short of what is needed.

Only a small section of the large property has been cleared and only a few of its mausoleums have been restored. A large part of it is impenetrable, except in good weather. But the gravestones and their names are an irreplaceable part of Jewish history.

There are still a few Jewish burials at the Okopowa cemetery, although for many years it was in such a terrible state it was not used.

Szenicer said Jews still living in or near Warsaw have told him they hope he will still be there when they die.

The Warsaw cemetery

From his Brussels office, Horowitz intends to visit the Warsaw cemetery often and do what he can to update its record keeping.

For more information, contact his parents in Toronto at 416-489-8863.

Funding arguments presented

and Freedoms; and that the Charter guarantee of freedom of religion requires the government to fund Jewish schools as well.

While the equality argument was his main line of attack, Morgan also argued that Jewish schools would be entitled to government funds even if Roman Catholic schools received nothing.

That was "an affirmative rights argument" that compared the funding situation to wheelchair access-ramps at public schools, he said.

Without those ramps, the disabled cannot use school facilities. Similarly, since the government requires parents to educate their children, it must also make that education accessible to all, he reasoned.

Morgan also addressed arguments advanced by government lawyers who suggested that funding would fragment the existing public school system and that these schools are needed to promote the values of tolerance and pluralism.

"Given that Roman Catholic schools get funding, [how do we] explain to children that it elevates pluralism and tolerance to fund only Catholic schools?" he asked.

Morgan concluded his submissions by calling for health support services for children in Jewish day schools. Those services should be considered health matters available to all and not an education service that's unavailable at Jewish schools, he argued.

For Susie Adler, who attended the day-long court hearing in Ottawa, the issue came down to one of morality and ethics.

"I feel very strongly about it," she said. "I don't understand why it's possible in other provinces [to fund Jewish schools] but it's impossible in Ontario."

Adler has two children attending Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto — Maya, 10, and Ilan, 6. Tuition for the two reaches about $14,000 per year. "So I have a vested interest in the outcome of the case," she said.

In fact, she is one of the five parents suing the province of Ontario and since hers is the first name on legal documents, the case is often referred to as "the Adler case."

She first got involved in the issue years ago by joining a parent support group that pushed for equal treatment for Jewish schools. Learning that Canadian Jewish Congress was preparing to launch a legal action, she agreed to lend her name to the effort.

Congress had been lobbying a variety of governments on the issue for decades, but all their arguments had fallen on deaf ears. After the SCC upheld the extension of funding to the upper grades of Catholic schools in the Bill 30 reference, Congress decided to take its case to the courts.

Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region, is "cautiously optimistic" about the outcome.

Ronen believes that the SCC's decision even to hear the case gives grounds for hope. Since the Supreme Court of Canada is not obliged to hear cases where the appellate court ruled unanimously (as is it did here against the parents), Ronen said he is heartened by their decision to do so.

A graduate of Toronto Hebrew Day Schools, Ronen said "the issue of funding is a high priority matter for our community and I made it a top priority for my administration."

The current situation imposes "a very harsh financial burden and there's no reason, when money is available for Roman Catholics and where government funds education, that we should not get funding," he said.

Looking ahead, Ronen said, "A political step is what we want, but experience shows us that politicians need a judicial firecracker to be applied to their rear ends.

"I'm hopeful there will be something in the written judgment that would allow Congress to go to the government and say, 'Here's a justification for acting.'

"Fairness and pluralism is what Canada is all about and we want politicians to see that," he added.

Are marital agreements becoming meaningless?

PART 1 OF 3

A recent minority decision of Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé of the Supreme Court of Canada has sent a significant chill down the spines of matrimonial lawyers.

These lawyers attempt to craft legally binding deals to settle spousal support claims or to draft marriage contracts that purport to limit spousal support or alimony rights. The finality of all such arrangements that presume to finalize forever spousal support or alimony claims has been called into question by Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's decision in a case originating in Quebec named B.(G.) v. G. (L.), which was released on September 21, 1995 with surprisingly little fanfare in the media. Her Lordship developed a fresh interpretation to amendments to Canada's Divorce Act, 1985, which stipulate that agreements which appear to specify alimony or spousal support payments (or extinguish them) in exchange for "full and final" releases in marital agreements may be ignored by the Court if the provisions for such support were not "fair." Such agreements are now to be treated by the courts as only one of several relevant considerations in a spousal support or alimony claim.

According to the language of the Divorce Act, the overriding considerations that dictate the Court's approach are the condition, means, needs and other circumstances of each spouse, including the length of cohabitation and their respective marital roles. Its orders should also recognize any economic advantages or disadvantages to the spouse arising from the marriage or its breakdown.

It should also relieve any economic hardship of the spouses arising from the breakdown of the marriage and promote, insofar as practicable, economic self-sufficiency. Note that none of these factors take precedence, not even a supposedly binding and final separation agreement or marriage contract or earlier court order that was supposed to prevent a spouse from asserting any further claims, notwithstanding any change in circumstances. Such an agreement is very relevant, but if the spouse is in need or the payer spouse (almost always the husband) is now enjoying more income, then the Court may no longer say: "Sorry, it may seem to be unfair. But a deal is a deal."

She's no George Burns but Messer's still 100

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Like George Burns, Mary Messer celebrated her 100th birthday in January.

Unlike George Burns, she did not expect all the attention she got.

On Jan. 11, there were flowers and good wishes from her fellow residents at Shalom Village Nursing Home and visits from family and friends.

Mary Messer celebrates her 100th birthday.

In the evening, certificates were presented by Shalom Village chair, Leslie Lasky, on behalf of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien; Premier Mike Harris; Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario Henry Jackman; as well as Hamilton West MP Stan Keyes; MPP Lillian Ross; Mayor Bob Morrow and Regional Chairman Terry Cooke. A certificate also came from her native United States.

Certificates presented

The following Sunday afternoon at a party hosted by family and friends, she celebrated with her daughter Mary Lions of Toronto, granddaughters Janice Armenta and Sandy Clark, seven great-grandchildren and friends Lu Loucks and Ursula Beerman from Toronto, as well as residents and staff.

Born in Rochester, N.Y., Messer has been a resident of Hamilton for the past 72 years. She was widowed 18 years ago and continued living in her own apartment until the age of 97, when she moved into the nursing home.

A real homebody, is how her daughter describes her. Her mother was always a good cook and especially, she says, "a great baker. I still use all her recipes. They're the best." She also enjoyed bridge, gardening, caring for her houseplants, embroidery and needlepoint.

A member of Temple Anshe Sholom, Messer was actively involved in Deborah sisterhood and Hadassah-WIZO.

Chocolate Sunday draws record crowd

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — More than 6,000 visitors came to the fifth annual Hadassah Chocolate Sunday, which occupied two floors at the local Convention Centre.

Stephanie Gilbert, chair of the event, says it was the best attended Chocolate Sunday yet, noting that hundreds waited outside in a torrential rainfall to see the 50 exhibitors and demonstrators of how to make special chocolate dishes, and to fill up on samples.

Chocolate pasta, chocolate sculptures and a tower of chocolate-dipped strawberries were among the highlights. The huge sculptures, displayed first at the Empress Hotel and then moved to the Conference Centre, were called Sweet Message of Peace. They depicted the Torah with a dove of peace attached, a menorah and the Jerusalem 3000 logo.

The sculptures will be sent to Vancouver for the community's celebration of Jerusalem 3000.

Sculptors Laurent Lhuillier, Maarten Schaddellee and George Wagner used over 1,000 kilos of chocolate for their work.

A children's corner with a fish pond was a popular feature.

All proceeds of Chocolate Sunday, which is fully organized on a volunteer basis, will go to Hadassah-WIZO.

Computer software caters to bridge fanatics

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There aren't many people who can successfully combine their pastime passion with their vocation, but Fred Gitelman is one of the lucky ones.

Gitelman has combined his knowledge of computers with his passion for bridge to come up with a lucrative business selling educational software programs.

The programs are found on diskettes that are plopped into computers to help both bridge fanatics and casual coortin shpielers (card players) sharpen their skills.

Working through his company, Bridge Base Incorporated, Gitelman devised a program designed for elite players. The program uses sophisticated mathematical formulae to determine possible card distributions in any number of dealt hands. The program helps top-level players solve problems that most weekend players wouldn't even realize existed, Gitelman said.

Since they were introduced in 1991, about 1,000 copies of the IBM-compatible diskettes have been sold at around $200 each. Gitelman marketed them through mail order and through companies that specialize in bridge-related products, and he sold them at tournaments, he said.

Realizing elite players constituted a very limited market, Gitelman decided to develop something more appropriate for the masses of weekend kitchen table bridge players.

The result of his efforts is Bridge Master, a computer program that helps improve the games of players of any level. Since its release in late 1992, about 7,000 copies have been sold, with about half going to European customers — the world's really hot bridge market, he said.

Featuring exceptional graphics, hundreds of possible hands to learn from and detailed explanations about the consequences of your play, Bridge Master received rave reviews from bridge mavens when it was released.

For Gitelman, that response from his peers — and subsequent sales of the product — was a valuable return on his investment. Coupled with his participation in tournaments around the world, Gitelman has turned bridge into a full-time career.

Now 30, he began his ascent up the bridge ladder during his high school years when friends enticed him into his first game.

"They thought I'd be good at it since I was good with computers," he said.

Attracted to bridge's problem-solving dimension, Gitelman took to it like a Webcrawler to the internet.

"I've worked very hard at it. I've done nothing else for the last 13 years, immersing myself in it," he said.

It even affected his education. Though he breezed through computer courses at York Mills Collegiate, studying computer science at the University of Toronto was a different story. "By that time I was pretty obsessed with bridge. I was cutting classes to play and to enter tournaments."

As a result, his marks were nothing to write home about and much of his knowledge of computers is self-taught.

After leaving university, he found a job with a software company where he worked for about three years. His girlfriend, Sheri Wine, suggested they go into business for themselves and write their own software programs for bridge.

Gitelman quit his job and borrowed $10,000 from his grandfather, while Wine put in some of her own money. For the next six months, Gitelman worked at devising the specialized program for expert players.

He also kept up his tournament play. Over the years, he developed contacts in the lofty regions of the bridge elite and was invited to join other top players in tournaments.

Playing with better players has helped him improve his game and he believes his desire to learn from the best has stood him in good stead.

"For many, bridge is an ego-driven game and a lot of people don't want to admit that they're wrong, so they don't get better. I went out of my way to solicit opinions from top players," he said.

Recently, he was part of a seven-man Canadian team that won a silver medal at the world championships in Beijing, China.

He frequently gets offers to play for prize money in U.S. tournaments, with one L.A. bridge aficionado offering him $1,000 (US) per day to team with him.

"I play for two weeks a year doing that, though I could spend 50 weeks a year doing it," he said. The going rate is closer to $400 (US) per day than $1,000, he added.

Money can be an important part of a formula for tournament success in bridge, Gitelman said. One wealthy U.S. amateur sponsored five top players to be his teammates for the chance of winning a world title. The strategy worked for that particular amateur, though most sponsors aren't good enough to hold up their end of team play, he said.

When he's not busy globetrotting the world (in 1995 he played in tournaments in Iceland, Holland, India, Denmark and China), Gitelman is making plans for his next computer venture.

He plans to develop a CD-ROM (a compact disc for computers) containing better graphics, visuals and sound effects than are found on diskettes. He's also considering going "online" (on international computer networks) to teach bridge seminars to subscribers.

And he's interested in writing a bridge column so that he can correct the annoying mistakes he says he regularly spots in newspaper features.

Ethiopian olim, police clash at PM's office

By BILL HUTMAN and BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Thousands of Ethiopian immigrants clashed with police outside the Prime Minister's Office Sunday, in one of the most violent demonstrations Jerusalem has seen in recent years. More than 70 people were hurt.

Police used tear gas, rubber bullets and stun grenades to break up the protest. One demonstrator was seriously wounded, after apparently being clubbed in the head by a police officer. A police officer was wounded in the eye by a stone.

The other wounded were reported suffering from only minor injuries, mostly tear gas inhalation. About half the wounded were police officers. Five demonstrators were detained, but released by the end of the day-long protest.

"Today the anger, built up from all the years of being lied to and expected to remain quiet, is being expressed," said Addisu Messala, head of the Unified Ethiopian Immigrants' Organization.

The protest was sparked by last week's revelation that the country's blood banks discard most blood donated by Ethiopian immigrants, because members of this community are 50 times more likely to be HIV carriers than other Israelis.

Protesters threw stones and bottles, beat police officers with umbrellas and vandalized parked cars.

At one point, the stone-and bottle-throwing forced many police officers to run for cover inside the Prime Minister's Office compound, as did the tear gas that turned on them with the wind.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres agreed to meet with Messala and other community leaders during a lull in the protest, and accepted their demand to set up a commission of inquiry to look into the immigrants' complaints.

Peres also issued an apology on behalf of the entire government for the slight to the community caused by the blood policy. But he also criticized the immigrants for the violence displayed during the demonstration.

The Prime Minister's Office, a multi-storied building surrounded by a fence, was under siege for most of the day by a crowd of demonstrators police estimated at between 8,000 and 10,000.

Border police stood atop the building and a police helicopter flew over the crowd. A water cannon and mounted police quickly proved useless in breaking up the protest.

"Stop the racism against black Jews," and "We are not viruses; we are black humans," were among the signs held by the protesters.

"I want the blood I donated over the last three years back," said Gideon Getahu, 25, of Karmiel. Getahu carried a club, that he said he would use to defend himself against police.

Another protester, his face covered with an Ethiopian flag, chanted: "Stop the racism," as he marched around holding a Magen David Adom blood donor's card in his hand.

Progress in talks reported

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel and Syria made some progress on normalization and economic matters in their last round of talks in Maryland, but there was no breakthrough, Prime Minister Shimon Peres said Sunday.

U.S. Middle East peace coordinator Dennis Ross met at his home for seven hours with the Israeli and Syrian delegation heads, ForeignMinistry Director-General Uri Savir and Ambassador Walid Mualem last Sunday.

No specific information on the session was available at press time.

"There is progress. It is still not a breakthrough. We have not solved all the problems. It's always a matter of definition," Peres told Channel 1.

"It is correct that on the issue of normalization there is progress, on the economics issue there is progress," he said. "On the issue of security arrangements, talks have begun."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our second annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings of the pageantry and the drama of the story of Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different contestants in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN Purim issue. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a prize worth $25.00.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be smaller than 5 by 7 inches. Please paint, draw, or color bright, colorful, evocative art. You can draw on any paper you wish, but keep in mind we are looking for pictures which will show bright colors well. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.

Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5:00 pm on Monday, Feb.19, 1996.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication. The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing, and the way it tells part of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, Feb. 23, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning pictures will be published in The CJN of Feb. 29, 1996. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Palestinian council faces big challenges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

With the euphoria of the Jan. 20 Palestinian elections receding, Yasser Arafat faces the enormous challenge of building a democratic, economically viable Palestinian entity in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

The task falls to Arafat because he is not only the leader of the PLO and head of the Palestine National Authority (PNA), but president of the 88-member self-governing council.

The Palestinian exercise in nation building is fraught with ambiguity and tension because the Palestinians and the Israeli government have fundamentally clashing interpretations of the Oslo peace accords.

For the Palestinians, the ultimate goal is a full-fledged Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with East Jerusalem as its capital. For Israel, however, Palestinian self-determination is not synonymous with statehood.

As important as it is in the long run, this issue will be temporarily shelved as the Palestinians try to come to grips with the crushing day-to-day burdens facing them in the wake of last month's elections.

The Palestinian economy tops Arafat's agenda. By design and neglect, it is in a shambles and too reliant on Israel.

There is little in the way of industry, production is insignificant and the unemployment rate is catastrophically high — between 30 percent and 50 percent.

The Palestinians want to build a productive, technologically advanced free market economy. To do this, they will need massive support from local entrepreneurs, the Palestinian Diaspora, Arab regimes and the international community.

At a donors' conference shortly after the 1993 Declaration of Principles was signed in Washington, foreign sponsors, spearheaded by the United States, pledged $2.5 billion over a five-year period.

Due to a number of difficulties, notably the PNA's patchy accounting procedures, the donors did not disburse the allotment expected by the PNA.

But with the PNA having improved its methods, the donor nations convened again last month and promised the Palestinians $850 million for the 1996 fiscal year, bringing to $1.3 billion the funds committed to the PNA since 1993.

Israel supports the infusions, since they bolster the PNA and, by definition, the peace process. That is why Israel itself has channelled funds to the PNA.

With a self-governing Palestinian council now in place, the question is whether the PNA can build a functioning democracy characterized by a respect for the rule of law, an independent judiciary, a tolerance of political diversity and a free press.

The outlook is not bright, given Arafat's penchant for arriving at unilateral decisions, his track record in the territories and the makeup of the self-governing Palestinian council.

Arafat has been chair of the PLO since 1969 and has run it in an autocratic style despite its democratic trappings. Democracy is not deeply rooted in the Arab world and Arafat has acted accordingly.

Since Arafat took up residence in Gaza in July 1994 to oversee the affairs of the PNA, he has come under sometimes sharp criticism for violations of human rights.

Human rights violations

Reports issued by Amnesty International, the U.S. State Department and B'Tselem (an Israeli civil rights organization) have accused the PNA of torturing and killing prisoners and of making arbitrary political arrests. Arafat himself has been criticized for his tight personal control over appointments and his failure to establish the mechanisms of democratic government.

The intimidation of opponents is also a cause for concern. Last August, a vocal political science professor who claims that Arafat is a dictator was shot and wounded in Nablus, an event ascribed to Arafat's secret police.

Furthermore, Arafat has exhibited little tolerance for human rights activists. Last December, Iyad Sarraj — director of the Independent Palestinian Commission for Citizens' Rights — was briefly detained without explanation. Last month, Bassm Eid — a B'Tselem official — was also arrested, then released.

In addition, Arafat has arbitrarily closed three Palestinian newspapers for various periods of time.

During the election campaign for the self-governing Palestinian council, charges flew thick and fast that the PNA had engaged in irregularities and gerrymandering.

And now that the council is packed with pro-Arafat Fatah members, there is a sense of unease that it will be little more than a rubber stamp for Arafat's decrees.

Israel, U.S.A. & the World

Arafat hesitates to change PLO covenant

[Cont'd. from page 1]

"The train will stop," Peres said of the peace process. The final-status negotiations are slated to begin in May.

Among the offending clauses of the 1964 Palestinian covenant are:

- Armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine.
- The establishment of Israel is fundamentally null and void.
- Zionism is "a racist and fanatical movement in its formation; aggressive, expansionist and colonialist in its aims."

Failure to revoke or amend the accords could also lead to an end to U.S. aid to the Palestinians.

In Washington, a congressional aide responded to Arafat's remarks, saying, "This Congress will not approve aid to the PLO if the covenant is not changed. It's that simple."

The United States has committed $500 million to the Palestinians over five years, but that aid is contingent on legislation known as the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act, which expires at the end of March.

According to the accords, the amendment of the charter must occur no later than two months after the inauguration of the new Palestinian government.

But Arafat sees it differently.

He said that in 1988 and in 1991, the Palestine National Council (PNC), the Palestinian parliament in exile, passed declarations that obviated the need to change the covenant.

The 1988 declaration affirmed Israel's right to exist and renounced terrorism, and in 1991, "we agreed to attend the Madrid peace conference. There is no need to confirm again what has already been confirmed," Arafat said.

Sitting in a cushioned chair in the official reception room at his Gaza headquarters, he tapped his feet impatiently when the issue was pursued.

It seemed beside the point that he had promised in a September 1993 letter to Yitzhak Rabin that the offending passages in the Palestinian Covenant would be revoked.

Instead, he talked of actions already taken by the PNC, maintaining that they had de facto and de jure – by force of fact and law – implied their acceptance of Israel's right to exist.

"What we have to do is approve the Oslo II accord," he said, referring to the agreement signed last September in Washington to extend West Bank autonomy.

This, too, he maintained, would reflect official Palestinian acceptance of the Jewish state.

Arafat has given mixed signals in recent years about his intentions on the covenant.

He often has referred to the clause as inoperative or caduc (the French word for null and void), when trying to justify why revocation is unnecessary.

In his 1993 letter of mutual recognition to Rabin, Arafat reiterated this but went further.

He said the "articles of the Palestinian covenant which deny Israel's right to exist" are "inoperative and no longer valid."

Consequently, the [Palestine Liberation Organization] undertakes to submit to the Palestinian National Council (PNC) the "necessary changes" for formal approval.

Last October in New York, he told a gathering of American Jews that he would definitely convene the PNC after the Palestinian elections to repeal the clause, if Israel would let all the members of the council enter the territories to vote.

Peres has said he would allow all members of the PNC into the autonomous areas to vote on abrogating the anti-Israel clauses of the charter.

On the future of Jerusalem, the eastern portion of which Arafat has repeatedly claimed as the capital of a future Palestinian state, Arafat confirmed a report that Israeli and Palestinian academics have been meeting to study the issue.

The talks could prove enormously significant. Similar discussions held in Oslo between academic specialists of the two sides paved the way to the historic 1993 Declaration of Principles that laid out the framework for what became the first step in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Indeed, the significance of Jerusalem to Arafat could be seen in the decor of his reception room. Directly behind his chair is an oblong photograph of the Old City, with the Dome of the Rock looming large in the foreground.

Asked whether he had any vision of a preliminary framework that might settle the Jerusalem question to the satisfaction of both sides, Arafat referred to the Rome-Vatican model he has often spoken of before.

"The details have to be discussed," he said, but he was hopeful that answers could be found.

The interview with Arafat took place in the context of a meeting between him and the director for interreligious affairs of the Latin American Jewish Congress.

Brazilian-based Rabbi Henry Sobel presented him with a sculpted dove of peace on the occasion of the Palestinian elections.

Israel wants PNC to alter document

Peres said it did not matter whether Hawatmeh stayed in Damascus, where he is based, or came to the self-rule areas.

However, in a statement to reporters in Damascus, Hawatmeh said he wanted to return, but not under the conditions set by Israel.

"We are ready, leadership and members, to return home. But that should not be under the conditions set by Peres," he said.

Israeli officials have made clear their expectation that the PNC will be convened to take action to amend or abrogate the covenant, and have cautioned that the peace process will be stopped if the PNC fails to do so.

Israel Radio, quoting Palestinian sources, said contacts were already under way in preparation for the permanent-status negotiations scheduled to begin in May.

On the agenda of these talks will be some of the most difficult issues that have yet to be resolved, including the status of Jerusalem, Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, borders and the political status of the Palestinians.

Meanwhile, Peres said that in the permanent arrangement, Israel would insist that Ma'aleh Adumim, a Jewish city in the West Bank near Jerusalem, remain under Israeli law.

Peres said he would follow the policy set by his predecessor, the late Yitzhak Rabin, on the matter.

Amir's lawyer angers judge

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Money from the United States intended to help fund Yigal Amir's defence is being blocked by the government here, Amir's lawyer, Jonathan Ray Goldberg, told Tel Aviv District Court Sunday.

As during previous hearings, Goldberg succeeded in incurring the wrath of Judge Edmond Levy for his apparent inability to defend his client.

"I have spent sleepless nights going over the evidence," shouted Levy.

"I don't understand why you are not well-versed in the evidence."

However, after much badgering, Levy agreed to consider financing expert defence witnesses, as long as Goldberg filed a formal request.

Scores of other objections raised during the hearing were repeatedly turned down by Levy, who eventually lost his patience and suggested that Goldberg be tried by the Israel Bar Association's disciplinary committee for "scandalous violation of ethics." He also threatened to charge him with court costs.

Amir's second lawyer, Mordechai Offri, officially resigned from the case Sunday.

"I took on this case on two conditions," said Offri. "The first was that the family would pay for all my expenses, which they haven't done. So far I have paid out of my own pocket for everything and haven't received a cent from them."

The second condition, said Offri, was that he would have the final say in how to conduct the defence.

Since the two lawyers' lines of defence did not correspond, Offri decided to quit.

"However I am convinced that Yigal did not mean to kill [Yitzhak] Rabin," he concluded.

Witnesses put on the stand by prosecutor Penina Guy did not agree, and described Amir's "calm state of mind" and his admissions that he intended to murder Rabin.

The prosecution is expected to bring its last witnesses Monday, including Rabin's bodyguard Yoram Rubin, who was wounded by Amir.

The first witness, Chief Supt. Mordechai Naftali, head of Hayarkon sub-district's investigations division, where Amir was first taken after his arrest, described his shock at Amir's reaction when he told him that Rabin was dead.

"He said that he had arrived at the square to execute the prime minister," said Naftali.

At this point, he added, Amir did not know of Rabin's death.

"Then I got a phone call from the sub-district commander [Ya'acov Shoval] who said: 'He was apparently successful.'

"I decided to get a confession, which he [Amir] dictated to me, and then tell him the premier was dead."

"When I told him, he did not move from his chair. 'Is he dead?' he asked.

" 'Yes,' I replied.

" 'In that case I have done my part,' replied Amir," said Naftali.

Hussein backs Arafat on capital

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Jordan's King Hussein expressed support for an independent Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital.

Hussein made the comment while speaking to reporters Sunday at Amman Airport, where he saw off Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who had been on a visit to Jordan.

During his stay in Jordan, Arafat met with members of the Palestine National Council, the parliament in exile, to discuss the Jan. 20 elections in which Arafat won nearly 90 percent of the vote to become the elected head of the Palestinian self-rule areas in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Jordan now has custodianship over Islamic holy sites in eastern Jerusalem.

Hussein has already said he would be willing to discuss that role once Israel and the Palestinians negotiate the final status of Jerusalem. Permanent-status talks between Israel and the Palestinians are set to begin in May.

Progress reported

He refused to elaborate.

But he said time was short — given that both Israel and the United States are to hold elections in the fall — and the work ahead long.

"I am a partner [to the idea] that there is a contradiction between the shortness of time and the seriousness and depth of the problems," Peres said.

Because of the wide gaps between the sides, the government is holding out little hope for real progress during Secretary of State Warren Christopher's visit to the region next week.

In Washington, it is already accepted that if there is no real progress in the next few weeks, the talks will be put on the back burner. But contacts, if not negotiations, between the sides will be maintained until after the U.S. and Israeli elections, to prevent any regression from what has already been achieved.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, the ministers heard the second part of a report from the IDF Intelligence Branch. No information was relayed to the media about its contents.

Yiddishe mama captures 'man's soul' in paintings

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli painter Ahuva Elisha (Huvy is her professional name) believes that her life is a miracle and that G-d assists her with what she creates.

Her faith has given her the inner strength to cope with and overcome the hardships she has faced.

On a recent visit to Israel, while strolling through Meah Shearim Toronto Rabbi Henry Hoschander and his wife Bea spotted an unframed painting in a store window.

"It was so vibrant and compeling that we felt an urgent need to inquire about the artist and the history of the painting," Bea Hoschander says.

"Her native talent and, of greater consequence, the genuineness of this petite middle-aged Yiddishe mama fascinated us," explains Bea. "We purchased several of her paintings and on our visits we gained an insight into what makes Huvy tick."

She was born in the Bucharian quarter of Jerusalem and at the age of six moved with her family to Vienna and then to Prague. In 1937, they settled in London, England, where she attended school.

Encouraged by her teachers, Huvy studied painting, sculpting and modelling at the St. Martin School in Charing Cross.

She was married with two sons when she returned with her family to Israel.

After she fell down a flight of stairs, her hands and neck became paralyzed and she suffered great pain. Because she was unable to paint, she became depressed, but found comfort in the Breslower chassidic movement.

Referring to the miracles in her life, she told the Hoschanders she believes G-d has a way of making things right. Her younger son had moved away from Yiddishkeit, but shortly after he completed his army service and returned home, Huvy woke up one morning and found her paralysis and pain were gone.

She was preparing to go tell her husband the good news, when her son appeared at her bedroom door in tallit and tefillin and told her he had just finished praying for her.

Huvy resolved to dedicate her life and talent to mitzvot and ma'asim tovim (good deeds), and whatever G-d gave her to do, she would accept it with love.

Huvy told the Hoschanders she believes her success comes from the fact that she doesn't paint bodies, but tries to capture man's soul on paper and canvas.

Rabbi Hoschander says her painting is "so vivid that the viewer actually feels and does not simply see the scenes."

Huvy has received acclaim for both her oil and water color paintings, which are exhibited at galleries in London, England, and in Israel at the Plaza and Hilton hotels in Jerusalem and at the Great Synagogue of Jerusalem.

Plans are underway for Huvy's paintings to be exhibited in Toronto and New York.

Ahuva Elisha's paintings are on exhibit in England and Israel.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Found Treasures: Published in Canada in late 1994, the compelling short story anthology Found Treasures: Stories By Yiddish Women Writers has sold more than 5,000 copies and has thus attained the status of a Canadian bestseller.

The book has gone into a second printing and, according to co-editor Frieda Forman of Toronto, has been picked up as an alternate selection by the hugely influential U.S.-based Book-of-the-Month Club. Over a period of five years, Forman and co-editor Ethel Raicus examined hundreds of Yiddish manuscripts in archives and private collections before choosing the two dozen "found treasures" that make up the anthology.

The book is used in university courses across North America and has received favorable reviews as far away as Germany, says Forman. "It's an astonishing response and one that fills us with great joy," she says.

In her 37-page introduction, American feminist and yiddishist Irena Klepfisz points out that women writers of Yiddish had been largely overlooked in a literary field that has been traditionally dominated by three great patriarchs – Mendele Mokher Seforim, Yitzhak Leibush Peretz, and Shalom Aleichem. As an example, Klepfisz cites A Treasury of Yiddish Stories, the best-selling 1954 anthology by Irving Howe and Eliezer Greenberg, which features 25 stories, all by men.

The editors and translators responsible for Found Treasures have brought new and long overdue attention to 18 women writers of Yiddish. Published by Second Story Press of Toronto, Found Treasures lives fully up to its name. It is available for $19.95 in many bookstores.

Mothers and Daughters Wanted: Veteran TV producer-directors Maureen Judge and Janis Lundman are developing an hour-long documentary for TVO about the highly-charged mother- daughter relationship as seen during the planning, execution and final stages of weddings.

"No matter what their age, women can talk for hours on the subject of their mothers and/or daughters," says Judge. "We felt the all-encompassing atmosphere of a wedding is the ideal place to capture the secrets and silences that mothers and daughters live with, and reveal those shared moments of anger, compassion, humor and love."

Expressive mother and daughter pairs who are planning a traditional wedding or something a little bit different are needed for this project. It doesn't matter which one is planning to be the bride. 416-504-3960.

Markham architectural firm looks to China for projects

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

MARKHAM — In 1991, when construction in Canada hit an alarming low, Markham-based Petroff Partnership Architects (PPA) began to look to China.

PPA partner David Kwok, who was born in Hong Kong, had heard that the Chinese government was planning to redevelop a 20-block parcel in the Pudong suburb of Shanghai to create a multi-purpose complex merging eastern life styles with western know-how.

PPA's proposal was accepted and the firm was commissioned to design four of seven buildings slated for the initial stage.

There were adjustments — learning to work with the Chinese government as an associate, and adapting to different building codes and other requirements.

Senior partner Henry Petroff, a University of Toronto alumnus, started studying Mandarin.

With the design completed, construction, which was the purview of the Chinese, began in 1994.

Since then, PPA has expanded its presence in Shanghai and other parts of the country.

Last year, the Chinese government sponsored an international design competition for a major renovation that would transform an eight-storey 61-year-old warehouse into a mammoth state-of-the-art shopping centre. "And we won!" Petroff exclaims.

The outstanding design, he says, is the concept of the firm's Michaela Weiner, who was able to preserve the integrity of the building's Art Deco facade while creating a sympathetic architectural ambience in the atrium which had been opened up through implosion of the core.

Almost everyone at PPA except Weiner doubted that sufficiently skilled craftsmen could be found to execute the fine detailing and accomplish the metamorphosis within the time frame set by the owners,

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

For Jewish travellers especially, some very fresh breezes are blowing across Spain.

More than 500 years after the Jewish expulsion, municipal officials in six Spanish cities have begun to work together to rehabilitate their country's long-forgotten Jewish heritage. One is the Catalonian city of Girona, situated about 80 kilometres northeast of Barcelona, between the Pyrenees Mountains and the Mediterranean Sea.

"You must realize that in Spain, that part of our history was not told for many years," said Assumpcio Hosta, who is contributing to a Jewish revival in Girona, where the Jewish presence dates from the ninth century, if not earlier. "Generations have grown up without any awareness of the Jewish past. Now we're trying to fill that gap."

According to Hosta, many Spaniards have become increasingly interested in Spain's Jewish and Muslim past, just as she herself first became intrigued by these exotic elements of her country's history about a decade ago.

"Ten years ago, it was not the same as today. Now many cities are hosting congresses in Jewish history, which would have been totally impossible even five years ago. Things have become more open. You can find classes of Hebrew and Jewish cooking, for example, in many cities."

Hosta, who recently visited Toronto, is director of an ambitious project in Girona called the Bonastruc Ca Porta Centre, which occupies a complex of restored 13th-century buildings in the Jewish quarter. The centre is the home of two institutes – the Catalan Museum of Jewish Culture, and the Nachmanides Institute for Sephardic and Kabbalistic Studies. The latter is named after Girona's famous 13th-century kabbalist-scholar, also known as R. Moses ben Nachman or the Ramban.

Over the past decade, workers have reclaimed and restored much of Girona's medieval Jewish quarter, a labyrinthine maze of ancient arcades, archways courtyards and passages locally referred to as the Call – the word derives from kahal, the Hebrew word for community. Additional elements are being uncovered all the time. As part of the Bonastruc Ca Porta Centre, planners intend to build a bookstore, a vegetarian restaurant and a lecture hall that will resound with concerts of Sephardi music and exhibitions, lectures and international symposiums on Jewish history, metaphysics and theology.

As well, the hunt has already begun for rare Hebrew manuscripts for the research library, in keeping with Girona's one-time predominance as a centre of Jewish mysticism or kabbalah. Besides the writings of the Ramban, works would include the commentaries of Ezra ben Solomon on the Song of Songs, the treatises of Ariel of Girona on Prayer, and many other important treatises conceived by the local circle of Jewish mystics. According to scholar Gershom Scholem, the "kabbalists of Girona were a group of epochal importance ... [who] stepped into the light of the history of religions undisguised and in full force."

Although the project involves Jewish heritage, Jews are not involved in planning to any great extent, Hosta acknowledged, for a simple reason; after the expulsion, the Jews never returned in sizeable numbers to Spain. Today, the country has fewer than 20,000 Jews out of a total population of about 40 million people.

"Whatever we do, we're doing from a non-Jewish point of view," she said. "This is not being directed by Jews. We're trying to focus on the common memory that we have together – not just the Jewish past, but the collective history of the Jews, Muslims and Christians who once lived together in harmony."

Organized itineraries and a rich assortment of tourist literature are available. For details, contact the Tourist Office of Spain in Toronto, 416-961-3131. Or write to the Friends of Girona Museum and Institute, 419 E. 57th St., Suite 10-B, New York, N.Y. 10022 (phone 212-715-1588).

the Municipal office of Finance and Trade.

"To our amazement," says Petroff, "the project came in beautifully fabricated and on schedule."

The dazzling, skylighted, 36,000-square-metre Donghai Commercial Plaza with its shopping, restaurant, entertainment and office levels plus roof garden and underground parking, opened to considerable fanfare in June 1995. The site on Nanjing Road East is comparable to Toronto's Queen's Quay.

Donghai, according to the newspaper Shanghai Star, caters mainly to wage earners, but also sells luxury goods to meet diversified demands.

PPA is now looking to projects in Putuo (Shanghai), Beijing, Suzhou and Guangzhou.

Locally, in North York, Boigon Petroff Shepherd Architects (a division of PPA), in joint venture with A. J. Diamond, Donald Schmitt and Company, is designing the new Jewish Home for the Aged at the Baycrest Centre on Bathurst Street. Construction is expected to begin this year.

Heart attack claims Lennick

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Lennick, one of Toronto's best known Jewish actors, died suddenly of a heart attack on Jan. 22. He was 77.

His long and successful career took him from the Theatre of Action in the 1940s to appearances with Wayne and Shuster on The Ed Sullivan Show, to CBC-TV. Along the way he acted, directed and produced plays at different theatres in Toronto. He was one of the few thespians in these parts who knew Yiddish theatre first hand.

This spring, he was scheduled to produce and direct Three Viewings at the Ford Centre Studio Theatre with his wife, Sylvia, also a well-known actor, and their daughter Julie in the cast.

Lennick's gravelly voice and skepticism were trademarks of At Home With The Lennicks, which ran on CBC radio in the '50s.

In addition to his wife and daughter, he is survived by two sons, radio producer David, and TV producer Michael.

Funeral services were held Jan. 25 at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, with burial at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park.

JVS program helps entrepreneurs get their start

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Richard and Tina Adler's swim school is a success story as refreshing as, well, an early-morning dip in the pool.

Not only have the 30-something couple made a go — and then some — of Swim Swim Swim, but Richard's transformation from employee to entrepreneur in difficult economic times has made him a role model for unemployment insurance (UI) recipients in the business training program that helped give him his start.

With a second pool about to open, the Adlers, who also run birthday parties at their small-but-cheerful Mississauga location, have come a long way from the days when they ran the business from their dining room and shlepped flutter boards and toys to rented hotel pools.

Three years ago, Richard was laid off after a 10-year career in retail management. The company for which he worked had downsized; it eventually went out of business.

While on unemployment insurance, Adler entered Jewish Vocational Service's Start Smart program, an intensive nine-week course for UI recipients funded by Human Resources Development Canada.

Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) is one of six Toronto agencies to offer the program. Each agency serves a different area of the city. Start Smart is the moniker chosen by JVS, which serves North York, but the official title of the country-wide initiative is the Self Employment Assistance (SEA) program.

"I think the government feels this is the way to go," said Kay Saunders, a longtime JVS employee and the Start Smart co-ordinator. "Growth in the economy has often been with small business. Many of [our] clients have been in the position where they're hiring. It's the big companies that are downsizing."

Last week, 23 new clients — men and women of various ages and backgrounds — attended their first session with business trainer Eileen MacIsaac. Each student had to be referred by Employment Canada; each had to submit a business proposal and undergo an interview before being accepted into the program, which runs four times yearly.

"They have to show us that their skills match what they want to do," said Saunders. "We're looking for a feeling that this person can carry out what they say they're going to do."

Tina and Richard Adler teach a young student to swim. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

A business idea has to be viable, she stressed. A person without the money (or the wherewithal to get enough money) to turn an idea into reality won't be encouraged.

For every budding entrepreneur who enters the program, three others have been sent by Employment Canada as potential participants. Some decide the program isn't for them. Of those who stick with it and submit a proposal, about half are selected.

The success rate has been high, said Saunders. Twenty-five of the 33 students (almost 76 percent) who graduated from the first class are still in business three years later. (More typically, over 60 percent of businesses fail in the first five years, MacIsaac notes.)

"We expect that 100 percent of you are going to be successful," MacIsaac said last week. "We expect that you will work very hard at your businesses."

Although participants are required to put in only 30 hours a week to continue to qualify for unemployment benefits, MacIsaac made it clear she expects them to put in much more time.

To help get their fledgling businesses off the ground, the government provides UI for a full year and the program matches clients with mentors to provide advice and serve as sounding boards. Follow-up includes networking with other graduates of the program.

Suzanne Topp, 29, a graduate of the fall session, turned to her business counsellor for feedback before making her first presentation at a large company. "I was prepared," she said of the successful result. The one-on-one counselling is particularly helpful, she noted, because it enables each new business owner to focus on addressing his or her unique concerns.

An actuary by training, Topp has parlayed her hobby of organizing sporting events for her co-workers into a business called Time Out! Limited. She now organizes events for corporate clients as well as for the Jewish community. A new volleyball league begins at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre Feb. 4.

Although Topp's business is one of the newer ones, she is already providing employment to volleyball officials and an assistant on an occasional basis.

Moldovan-born Mark Chkolnik, 36, was in Topp's Start Smart group. A clothing manufacturer before immigrating five years ago, he applied himself to learning English and getting Canadian work experience, first at Danbury Sales, a large-scale liquidation company, and later as a Russia-based business representative for a Canadian exporting company.

When the latter enterprise, like so many others, implemented cutbacks, Chkolnik lost his job and went on unemployment insurance. With business contacts and related experience, he was anxious to start his own business buying and selling end-of-line merchandise.

"To be independent is the best," he says. He found the course particularly useful in imparting necessary background information on banking and Canadian business law.

Now the proprietor of MCH Enterprises, Chkolnik buys a variety of items (wallpaper rolls, for example) below cost, and either resells them to retail clearance centres or dollar stores, or exports them to Eastern Europe.

He began the business with his own savings. "It's not very expensive to start," he said. The profit on any one lot enables him to make a more substantial purchase the next time, thus generating a larger profit, he explained. "I see a future [in this business]."

If Chkolnik doesn't have enough capital to buy a particular lot himself, he'll buy in partnership, he said.

Richard Adler also knows the importance of being flexible. Although he initially planned to go into retailing, he decided during his time at Start Smart to concentrate his efforts on the swim school, a project his wife had begun and one with which he was already helping out.

"Don't be afraid to take risks," said Adler when he returned to Start Smart to address graduating students as an invited guest. "I would never work for anyone else again."

Chicago winger relies on hard work, physical play

Steve Dubinsky adds enthusiasm to Blackhawks lineup

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Steve Dubinsky is an admitted late bloomer.

Back in his minor hockey days playing in Montreal's north shore, he didn't exactly tear up the league.

When he skated for Pierrefonds in Quebec's Tier II junior hockey loop, nobody seemed to notice his play and he wasn't signed by any major junior hockey team.

So at age 19, the native of Dollard-des-Ormeaux (a Montreal suburb) packed his hockey bag and headed to Clarkson University in the NCAA's East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC), where he asked for a tryout.

Dubinsky, a six-foot, 190-pound banger and crasher, impressed the Clarkson coaches and played his way onto the team. Eventually he impressed some NHL scouts as well, and Chicago made him their ninth choice, 226th overall in the 1990 entry draft.

Since then, Dubinsky, 25, has clawed and scratched his way into the Blackhawk lineup, relying on his gritty, in-your-face style of play to keep him playing in "The Show."

"Growing up, I was never really a high profile player. I worked hard and got my share of goals. I just peaked late, in college, and that has helped me a lot," he said.

Last week, with the Hawks visiting Toronto on "Kirk Muller night," Dubinsky saw only limited action but managed to register an assist as he took a hit to make a nifty drop pass to Joe Murphy at the Leafs' blueline. The Hawks winger set up Brent Sutter for their first goal.

The helper boosted Dubinsky's point total to a grand total of four (1 goal, 3 assists in 17 games), but he readily acknowledges that turning on the red light is not how he's made it to the NHL.

"They want me to be a physical player, work hard and show some enthusiasm," he said.

Dubinsky's numbers all through college point to the fact that he's no stranger to collecting points.

In his best year, 1991-92, he scored 20 goals and added 31 assists in 32 games (almost a full season). In the pros, it's been a slightly different story.

In 1993-94, his first season in Chicago, he got into only 27 games and scored two goals and six assists. He also spent 16 minutes in the sin bin.

Most of that season was spent with the Indianapolis Ice, the Hawks' International Hockey League (IHL or I) affiliate, where he notched 40 points in 54 games.

Last year, in the NHL's abbreviated season, he got into only 16 games and got no points. In the I, however, he scored 16 goals and 11 assists in 62 games.

"In the IHL, I do everything," he said following a recent Hawks practice at Maple Leaf Gardens. "I kill penalties and take a regular shift."

Like many other third and fourth line forwards, Dubinsky has been hurt by the "televisation" of hockey, in which game action is repeatedly stopped and players skate to the bench to wait until commercials finish running. The stoppages mean high profile, star players get frequent rest breaks and coaches re-insert them into games more readily than if there was a continual flow of action.

That in turn, means less ice time for the likes of Dubinsky and his regular linemates, Jeff Shantz and Jim Cummins.

In the Leaf game last week, Dubinsky got only a couple of shifts in each of the first two periods, and didn't see the ice at all in the third in what was for a lengthy stretch, a tight 2-1 Blackhawk lead. Toronto scored late in the game for a tie.

"I'm more likely to see ice time when the team has a two or three goal lead," Dubinsky said.

Still and all, he's not complaining. It's not many Tier II/U.S. college players who make it to the NHL. And in the three years he's been in the league, he feels he's improved his game and is playing with more confidence.

When all is said and done and his pro hockey career is over, Dubinsky would like to get involved in advertising and marketing, his favorite subjects at Clarkson while studying for a BSc in management.

Back then, "I didn't think I'd be in the NHL," and he made education a top priority, he said.

His parents, Gerry and Janice, who now live in Outremont, encouraged him to get a degree. Growing up in Dollard, he attended Congregation Beth Tikvah Hebrew school.

Dubinsky is married to a fellow Montrealer, Sheryl Lieber. The two now make Chicago their year-round home.

Nemirovsky tearing up OHL

Since we last reported on him in our Jan. 4 issue, Florida Panthers prospect David Nemirovsky has been tearing up the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), the province's major junior circuit.

He's collected nine goals and 10 assists in eight games playing with Sarnia Sting. He was recently named OHL player of the week after scoring six goals and four assists in one seven-day period.

Prior to playing for Sarnia, his junior rights were held by the Ottawa 67s, but, on being returned to junior by the Panthers, he refused to report to the nation's capital. Eventually his rights were traded to the Sting.

Monitor provides a lifeline for cardiac clients

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not too long ago, an Israeli newspaper reported on the near tragic story of a visitor to Paris.

The visitor had a history of cardiac problems and had obtained a special heart monitoring device from a hi-tech Israeli company. Feeling poorly while on vacation, she telephoned a number in Israel, placed the CardioBeeper device on her chest and it transmitted her electro-cardiogram (ECG) to an office in Israel.

Shortly after the transmissions began she collapsed due to a heart attack. However, the Israeli attendants, knowing where she was, telephoned the hotel operator, explained the situation to them and had them order an ambulance for the visitor. Her life was saved.

That's an extreme example of the sort of scenario that the CardioBeeper is meant to address, said Iris Kowen, manager of operations for Every Minute Counts Inc. (EMC), a Toronto-based company that has been marketing the device in Eastern Canada since July.

Developed in Israel by Shahal Medical Services, the CardioBeeper is slightly bigger than a walkman and has a strap attached to it containing 12 "leads," or electronic pads. When placed on a client's bare chest, the pads take a dozen readings of the heartbeat and the device transmits the information over regular telephone lines to monitors in the EMC offices, she said.

There, nurses who work in hospital cardiac intensive care units view the readings on computer screens and compare them to baseline readings taken earlier from the client.

Iris Kowen sits at the monitoring device that receives ECG transmissions from the CardioBeeper. [Paul Lungen photo]

Based on a comparison of those readings and by discussing the symptoms with the client, they determine whether that person should go to hospital, Kowen said.

Two cardiologists are on call and can be consulted at any hour, she added.

Should a client be in distress, the nurses summon an ambulance and fax the client's readings and medical history to the hospital emergency room, giving doctors a head start in determining the person's condition.

The idea behind the product — and hence the company name — is one of early detection, Kowen said. Often, people may feel discomfort if not outright pain but discount it as indigestion or some other malady. On average, people wait two to three hours before calling for help and in that time, the heart muscle can suffer serious damage.

With the CardioBeeper, problems can be detected early. "The earlier you can get to a hospital, the earlier you can get the proper drug treatment to dissolve a clot and prevent damage to the heart muscle," she said.

"We don't prevent a heart attack, but we reduce the damage it can do."

Alternatively, the nurses who speak to clients can reassure them that they are not suffering a heart attack and do not need to visit an emergency ward, taking a load off the overburdened medical system and sparing a client a five or six hour emergency room wait before being told they should go home.

Recently, one client called the service late one night during a weekend, said Ellis Kowen, Iris' husband and president of the company. With a heart rate of about 200, she was sent to hospital. By the time she got there it had returned to normal but the ECG and other medical history provided by the service enabled the doctors to adjust her medication, he said.

The product has proven a success in Israel where about 40,000 subscribers have obtained it, Iris said. That client base was built in only eight years and Kowen hopes the growth in Canada will be similar.

The CardioBeeper, which was developed in a joint venture between Shahal and an American inventor, can be purchased outright for about $800 or leased to purchase over 18 months. In addition, the client pays a monthly fee of between $29 and $39 for the monitoring service.

"The goal is to make it affordable, so there are payment plans," she said.

Kowen said the company expects to eventually market another portable device that allows patients to take their blood pressure at home.

Dear Lisa,

Common buzzwords today include the terms restructuring and downsizing. We all know what the words mean and we support the idea of budget reduction. But what about the high percentage of the population that have lost their jobs?

Dear Reader,

The jobs of today may not be quite what we have seen in the past. However, jobs do exist and in many cases are going begging for applicants. These tips may help you find those hidden opportunities.

Consider your job title. Almost every job can be redefined and given a new title. This brings a job of the '80s into the money-saving '90s. Tasks are no longer grouped in the same way; so job hunters need to know what types of tasks they enjoy doing. A secretary, for instance, may really enjoy her problem-solving and receptionist duties. By calling herself a labor fulfilment worker specializing in the area of reception and customer service, she can market herself in a new way that is more in tune with today's job market.

Write a terrific resume. Pretend you are an employer. How much time would you give a resume upon first glance? The average is about seven seconds. Wouldn't you like to see the most relevant experience listed first?

Most employers like short resumes which detail an applicant's recent experience and education. Do you really care about style? Most employers want a resume written in a format which is easy to read and not particularly fancy. Designer paper is also unnecessary.

Should the resume guide the employer to what type of work the applicant wants to do? Absolutely. A resume without direction usually won't be taken seriously and likely won't be considered for any opportunities.

Use a strong cover letter. Whenever you send your resume anywhere, send a cover letter along. The cover letter is an introduction to your resume, lets the reader know why your resume is being sent and is an opportunity to relate your experience to the vacancy you are applying for. Keeping all these things in mind, a short cover letter is far better than a long one and a business formatted letter is most appropriate.

Look like a winner. A winner walks straight and tall. A winner smiles and shakes hands. A winner exudes confidence even if the prime motivation or feeling is one of fear or confusion. A winner listens intently and thinks before responding. A winner treats others as he or she wishes to be treated and surrounds him or herself with other winners.

Keep on hunting. These tips won't secure you a job if you can't find one to apply for. So look! Research the company you would like to work for. Find out which department would employ someone with your skills and experience. Arrange for a meeting with that department manager. Call the competitors of these firms and do the same thing. Read the newspaper for firms that are growing or restructuring. Join a support group for job hunters. Volunteer in an environment where you can practise the tasks you would like to be paid for doing.

The market always has a way of providing opportunities for qualified applicants. Seek and you shall find.

U of T program focuses on the Jewish experience

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Having just celebrated its 25th anniversary, the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto is on its way to becoming one of the most important such programs in North America predicts its director, Jacques Kornberg.

He said the program was created in 1969 in a response to the increasing recognition that Jewish culture, history, civilization and religion in the post-biblical era merit serious academic attention along with the biblical tradition.

"It has taken off since then because of our reputation as a first-rate school and for having first-rate educators," he adds.

The Jewish Studies program is an interdisciplinary one, combining courses from the departments of English, German, history, Middle East and Islamic studies, Near Eastern studies, philosophy, sociology and the study of religion. It offers over 60 courses in languages, literature, religion, history, archeology, philosophy, sociology and civilization from antiquity to the present.

"The program is concerned with the Jewish experience as it shifted in time and place from the ancient land of Israel to the many countries of the Jews' dispersion, to the creation of the State of Israel and through contemporary Judaism," says Kornberg.

Some of its many courses include The Holocaust: Nazis, Occupied Europe and the Jews; History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal; Codes and the Legal Tradition; Israelis and Palestinians in the 20th Century; Life Cycles and Personal Status in Judaism; as well as Yiddish and Hebrew language courses and an introduction to Yiddish literature.

Scholarships and awards are given annually to, among others, an outstanding or deserving student, a student planning a career in Jewish education or Jewish communal service, or a student enrolled in a specialist or major program in Jewish studies.

Kornberg says search committees are currently working to fill two positions. "Benefactors have endowed one chair in Jewish Studies and other benefactors have endowed the Samuel Zacks professor in Jewish history.

Currently the Shoshanna Shier Distinguished Visitor in Jewish studies is Professor Lawrence Shiffman from New York's University, an expert on the Dead Sea Scrolls. In one course, he will introduce students to both the ancient and modern controversies surrounding the Dead Sea Scrolls and in another, he will study the rise of Jewish biblical interpretation in the Second Temple period, concentrating on material found in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Baycrest Campaign gears up

TORONTO — Organizers of the Baycrest Campaign have raised $40 million thus far and they are gearing up again.

"We still have to find $20 million dollars if we're going to make everyone's dreams come true," says campaign co-chair Allan Offman.

Since last spring, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has been working to raise a total of $60 million, despite tough economic times.

Most of the money will go toward building a state-of-the-art facility to replace the existing 372-bed Jewish Home for the Aged, which no longer meets the needs of the community. The new facility will also include a 100-bed Centre for Cognitive Disorders. The remainder of the funds will be used to expand programs and services in areas such as rehabilitation, respite care, education and research.

"At the time it was designed in the 1960s, the home was meant to accommodate a much younger, healthier population" than that needing help today, says Stephen W. Herbert, Baycrest president and chief executive officer. The average age of residents is now 86 and most are suffering from some degree of cognitive impairment.

The main problems with the existing building include limited space for recreational activities, lack of privacy and storage space, a shortage of basic bathing facilities, limited dining room facilities and a layout which makes it hard to manoeuver wheelchairs and other assistive devices.

The proposed new home — to be called the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged — will change our current concept of a long-term care facility, says Herbert:

- Living areas in the new seven-storey home will be arranged in several clusters or "home units."
- Each home unit will feature private bedrooms with common areas, including a comfortably furnished living room and communal dining area.
- A kitchenette and grooming centre equipped for bathing and personal care will be shared among groupings of home units.
- Common areas of the new building, including a spectacular indoor garden, will encourage activity and involvement of residents and their families.

The Centre for Cognitive Disorders will serve the special needs of people suffering from vascular dementia.

Over the past year, Baycrest planners (including residents, family members, volunteers, community representatives, staff and Baycrest board members) have developed a functional framework for the project, which outlines space and staff requirements.

Using this as a blueprint, two Toronto architects, Jack Diamond and Irving Boigon, are heading up a world-class team of architects who will design the new building.

Approximately half of the funding for the combined Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and Centre for Cognitive Disorders will come from the Baycrest campaign. Proposals for capital contributions to cover the remaining cost have been submitted to the Ontario Ministry of Health and other funding sources.

If all goes as planned, the new facility could open its doors by the end of 1998.

The Weekly FOOD GUIDE

Bread: The Staff of Life

Highland Farms offers more than 200 different kinds of bread to satisfy any taste. Bread styles from the Middle East, The British Isles, Europe and North America. The most interesting new bread comes from Manoucher Specialty Foods, which promises: "We never make bread with machines." And what bread!!

Start with a sesame loaf (Barbaree) and the label says: "Ancient Persian Emperors feasted on such bread." I'm far from a Persian emperor, but I feast on that loaf. Then there's a garlic loaf, a basil loaf, a herb and cheese loaf, a rosemary and onion loaf and a Mediterranean loaf titled Fokachio Romana. And here's a tip: slice the loaf and add dates, or sundried tomatoes. A supreme taste treat.

Speaking of taste, one of the great taste sensations for breakfast is a hot buttered croissant, with a dab of honey or jam. I've done my own informal survey, and Highland Farms' Angelo the baker, produces the finest croissants in town. And at 50 cents, the one of the least expensive! Was it Candice Bergen who said "the best for the least?"

Kol Torah Rabbinical College • Jerusalem

To all of our friends, Blessings of Peace and Long Life!

Our yeshiva has, Baruch Hashem, firmly established its excellent reputation. But more than any words could possibly express, let the thousands of alumni come and testify to the excellent education which they received, the wisdom they acquired and especially the love of Torah and Mitzvot with which their devoted mechanchim — teachers — imbued them. Let them bear witness to the personal concern for their spiritual and physical welfare which was demonstrated during their stay in the yeshiva.

In retrospect, all this seems impossible considering the economic conditions under which the yeshiva was forced to function. With expenses constantly increasing and the bills mounting, we depend on the generous support of our devoted friends who continue to extend a helping hand.

I therefore turn to each and every one of you and ask that you join this dedicated group of supporters and assist to the best of your ability in this holy cause. Your reward from Hakadosh Baruch Hu is unimaginably great.

With best wishes and blessings for success in all your spiritual and material endeavors.

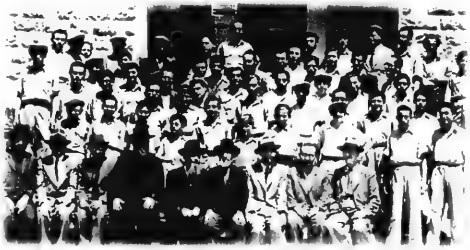
Sincerely yours,
Shlomo Zalman Auerbach

Rav Shlomo Zalman's Legacy

Our Rosh Yeshiva has left us. Rav Shlomo Zalman Auerbach זצ"ל returned his neshama to his Creator on 20 Adar Aleph 5755, after serving with devotion as the Rosh Yeshiva in Rabbinical College Kol Torah for 46 years.

Rav Shlomo Zalman passed up offers to serve on the Supreme Rabbinical Court and as Jerusalem's Chief Rabbi, instead favoring his beloved talmidim until his last breath. The Chazon Ish זצ"ל encouraged Rav Shlomo Zalman to stay at Kol Torah, assuring him that he would be able to serve Klal Yisrael not only as a Posek Halacha, but also as a Rosh Yeshiva.

For nearly five decades, Rav Shlomo Zalman energized Kol Torah students with his inspiring, yet humble demeanor. Through his very presence, they sensed the true meaning of "Torah with Ethics" — in a manner that no textbook could possibly convey.

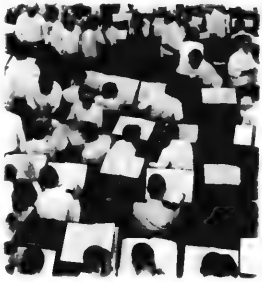


Rabbanim and students during the first years of Kol Torah

Rav Shlomo Zalman spent his every moment engaging in Torah, Tefillah and Gmilut Chasadim. His passing leaves a void in the hearts of all who knew him — from the talmidim who zealously drank from his well of wisdom, to the elderly lady in his Sha'arei Chesed neighborhood who looked forward to the cheerful "good morning" with which Rav Shlomo Zalman would greet her every day.

Lo BaShamayim Hi

The Legacy Lives On



The Main Beit Medrash of the Yeshiva

Kol Torah has firmly established its reputation as one of the foremost centers of Torah study in Israel — and the whole world. The yeshiva was founded in 1939 by the late Rav Yechiel Michel Schlesinger זצ"ל and the late Rav Baruch Kunstadt זצ"ל. Kol Torah continues the proud tradition of the yeshivot in Germany which were destroyed in the Holocaust.

Some 5,000 Torah scholars have attended Kol Torah since its founding. Kol Torah alumni are widely acknowledged in Torah circles for their special blend of Torah proficiency, mannerly behavior and firm commitment to the eternal values of our people.

Kol Torah's curriculum emphasizes ethics and derech eretz. Our students originate from every community and from all strata of society. Many graduates have in turn established new Torah centers throughout the world, with countless alumni working as principals and educators in Torah institutions of every kind.

When Rav Shlomo Zalman started teaching at the Kol Torah Rabbinical College after the passing of Rav Yechiel Michel Schlesinger in 1949, the yeshiva accommodated 80 talmidim. When the Torah giant returned his pure neshama to the Almighty a few months ago, he left behind over 700 talmidim.

The late illustrious Rosh HaYeshiva Rav Shlomo Zalman Auerbach זצ"ל with the Rosh HaYeshiva Rav Moshe Yehuda Schlesinger שליט"א (son of the late Rav Yechiel Michel Schlesinger זצ"ל)

The Mashgiach Emeritus Rav Gedalia Eiseman שליט"א with the late Rav Elhanan Moshe Kunstadt זצ"ל (son of the late Rav Baruch Kunstadt זצ"ל) who passed away during the last year.

The Rabbinical College campus is located in the serene Jerusalem neighborhood of Bayit Vegan, in structures that were constructed over 40 years ago to accommodate 250 students. Even with all the restoration and expansion which has been done, the buildings are not in any way capable of housing our present student body. Needless to mention, the overwhelming challenge of providing daily upkeep for our student body puts a constant burden on the Yeshiva.

More than 850 well-qualified talmidim asked to join Kol Torah this year, but space limitations allowed us to accept only 120 of them. As a befitting memorial and tribute to Rav Shlomo Zalman זצ"ל, Kol Torah is embarking on a building campaign whose purpose is to erect a new Beit Medrash building. This will allow us to accommodate our present student body and be able to respond to a greater number of those who hope to be imbued with Rav Shlomo Zalman's זצ"ל special Torah Legacy, and prepare them to address the unfolding challenges facing their home communities.

Likud, Tsomet unite for election

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Likud and Tsomet have reached agreement on establishing a united electoral bloc for the next elections that may be held as early as May 14. The agreement is to be initialed this week.

Though neither party would officially confirm the reports, sources said the deal has been struck and Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan will not run for prime minister.

The parties will not merge, but will be fielding a single Knesset ticket and will both back Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu for premier.

After the elections, the parties will have the option of remaining together in a united parliamentary bloc or going their separate ways and setting up their own Knesset factions.

The agreement between the parties resulted chiefly from Likud efforts to end Eitan's candidacy, which Netanyahu viewed as particularly detrimental to his chances against Shimon Peres.

The agreement was hammered out in a series of near-clandestine meetings by Likud director-general Avigdor Lieberman and Tsomet director-general Doron Shmueli. After it is initialed, the agreement must be ratified by the central committees of both parties.

Under the deal, Eitan will get the second spot on the joint ticket and Tsomet will get eight slots in the first 40.

The key to the allocation of slots is the number of seats won in 1992 by Likud and Tsomet. Likud won 32 Knesset seats, and Tsomet started the present term with eight. It was agreed to overlook the defection from Tsomet of Gonen Segev, Alex Goldfarb and Esther Salmovitz, and David Levy's and David Magen's leaving the Likud.

Besides removing Eitan from the prime ministerial race, the agreement is geared to giving the national camp a morale boost. Its actual electoral value is hard to gauge.

Bar-Ilan error has Amir in brochure

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — American Friends of Bar-Ilan University, still reeling from the shock of finding out the confessed killer of Yitzhak Rabin was a Bar-Ilan student, sustained another public relations nightmare late last week.

Israeli media reported that the university deliberately used promotional material here in New York featuring pictures of the confessed killer, Yigal Amir.

Such a claim was "inconceivable," said Hedy Shulman, director of public relations for American Friends of Bar-Ilan.

Doing that deliberately "would be the equivalent of suicide" for the organization, she said.

Nonetheless, Shulman said she was "horrified" to learn last Friday that pictures of Amir were inadvertently published in a promotional journal distributed at the organization's dinner on Jan. 21 in New York.

"It was a total, inadvertent catastrophe," she said. "We are extremely pained and horrified."

Bar-Ilan University president Moshe Kaveh said the inclusion of Amir's photo was "an egregious error of oversight, not an act of intent or malice."

Kaveh, who took office Feb. 1, said the brochure had been prepared wholly by American Friends, and that no administration members had seen it before it was distributed at the dinner.

He said that in the wake of the incident, the university would demand to review all promotional literature.

Yehuda HaLevy, the chair of the American fundraising arm, left Sunday for Israel to meet with administration officials.

Shulman took pains to explain that the dinner was initially scheduled for Nov. 12, but was postponed out of respect for the memory of the slain prime minister.

The Jan. 21 dinner itself "turned out to be a tribute to Yitzhak Rabin," she said.

The dinner journal contained photos taken the year before and chosen in October, she said. Sometime before the dinner, she said, the organization was alerted to the fact that some people thought Amir was pictured in the journal, "but we concluded it wasn't him," she said.

"To have this depicted as a deliberate, conscious [effort] to glorify" the killing "goes totally against anything we stand for," said Shulman.

Shlomo Eckstein, who ended his appointment as university president Jan. 31, said that by an oversight no one checked the pictures after the Rabin assassination.

Eckstein said the chances of Amir being chosen for the brochure was one in 20,000, and of appearing in the journal, after the assassination, was one in a million.

"The absurdity that in a journal dedicated wholly to the memory of Yitzhak Rabin, that the picture of the murderer as one of several students appears in it, is impossible to explain," he told Israel Radio.

Several Israeli legislators demanded explanations for the oversight. Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein said steps should be taken against those responsible for the brochure.

Immigration Stats

JERUSALEM — Some 75,400 new immigrants arrived here in 1995, a drop of six percent over the previous year, the Central Bureau of Statistics said.

In its yearly review of immigration, the bureau said 64,000 immigrants arrived from the former Soviet Union — 76 percent of them from European areas and 24 percent from Asian areas.

A total of 709,800 immigrants have arrived since the current wave of immigration began in late 1989, the bureau said, of which 610,000 were from the former Soviet Union.

Talmud On The Internet

JERUSALEM — A data base incorporating the basic works of Jewish scholarship; the Bible Mishnah, the Tosefta, the Babylonian and Jewish Talmuds, all in their original Hebrew and Aramaic texts, is now available for the first time on the Internet through the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Likud Policy

JERUSALEM — Nearly all the members of the Likud's political forum met last week and expressed their support for a "practical" approach toward the Palestinian Authority (PA), and the need to negotiate with it if the Likud wins the next elections.

MK Ze'ev Begin maintained his opposition to adopting a softer policy on the PA.

Singapore's Ambassador

JERUSALEM — Singapore has appointed its first ambassador to Israel.

Singapore's government announced last week that Foo Meng Tong, 54, would present his credentials to Israeli President Ezer Weizman.

Israel and Singapore established diplomatic relations in 1969, but Singapore never opened an office in Israel.

Female Recruits Train

JERUSALEM — About 40 female recruits for Israel's Border Police will start combat training next month, another step in breaking the exclusive male hold over the Jewish state's fighting forces.

All positions will be open to women, including the Yamam anti-terror commando squad, a police spokesperson said.

Trade With India

JERUSALEM — Israel and India have signed a trade agreement aimed at significantly boosting bilateral commerce between the two countries.

Wannsee Exhibit

BERLIN — Four years since the opening of an exhibit at the Wannsee Conference House, about 184,000 visitors have seen a presentation on the Nazis' plans for the extermination of the Jews.

At the January 1942 Nazi conference, the logistics for killing Europe's Jews was discussed. The conference was held at what was then the central office of Interpol.

Last year, 310 groups participated in study groups and seminars held at the house.

Farrakhan Meeting

JOHANNESBURG — Two South African Jewish groups have criticized President Nelson Mandela for meeting here with Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan as part of his African tour.

U.S. Foreign Aid

WASHINGTON — Israel will finally receive its $3 billion 1996 foreign aid package from the United States, albeit four months late and at a cost of more than $25 million to the Jewish state.

A compromise during debate on a stopgap spending measure designed to avert a third federal government shutdown freed the $12.1 billion foreign aid bill from legislative limbo.

Israel received about 12 percent of its aid in two previous continuing resolutions passed to keep the U.S. government functioning during the federal budget impasse.

Sephardi community pushes northward

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — It seems Metro Toronto's Sephardim are mimicking their Ashkenazi cousins with a population push northward.

York Region, especially Thornhill, Markham and Richmond Hill, is now home to an estimated 1,000 Sephardi families — roughly the same as in Metro — and services are expanding at an ambitious rate.

Two recent events show how Bathurst Street continues to throb with Jewish life, even if it's north of Metro's Steeles Avenue boundary.

PROPOSED ZONING CHANGE

Late last month, ground was broken for the long-awaited Or Haemet Sephardic School on three acres of land on Bathurst, just north of Steeles. The three-storey building will also house a synagogue, mikvah, study hall, library, swimming pool and gym, banquet hall and meeting rooms.

There was a ground-breaking for the school in 1990 but the project was put on hold because of lack of funds.

As the nerve centre of Ontario's growing Sephardi community, the building will also house the newly-formed Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, an umbrella organization representing several synagogues and communal groups, with Rabbi Amram Assayag as its chief rabbi.

Since its founding in 1975, Or Haemet has gone from the basement of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla synagogue to its current location in Adath Israel Congregation. The new facility will serve children from nursery through Grade 8.

Plans call for the structure to be built of Jerusalem stone. "It will not only house our school but will be a centre for our entire community," said Or Haemet president Jacques Benquesus. Also in the works is a fund-raising campaign across Metro.

Less than a kilometre north along Bathurst, a Sephardi synagogue is one step closer to reality.

Last week, Vaughan's council unanimously approved the official plan for Bet Midrash Bar Yochai Congregation, whose 100 family members have met in a house on nearby Arnold Avenue for the past six years.

If there are no appeals within 30 days, the city is expected to approve the site plan and zoning change, Vaughan ward 5 councillor Bernie Green told The CJN.

The Orthodox synagogue will be on two lots, one currently vacant. There were initial concerns from area residents about parking, but plans call for the synagogue to have underground space for 12 cars, while the Promenade shopping mall across the street has guaranteed some parking spaces.

The 4,600-square foot synagogue will be accessible by car only via Bathurst Street, alleviating some concerns about congestion from residents on Arnold and Rodeo Drive, Green said.

While in Jerusalem...

In Jerusalem, the sixth International Conference of the Jewish Media is over. I am leafing through my notes, seeking a way to condense them into a meaningful distillate of insight and reflection, but there are far too many.

After a festive opening event which focused our hearts and our minds on Yitzhak Rabin, the program comprised three days of lectures, seminars and discussions, and two days of field trips and fact finding. Over the course of five days, more than 60 politicians, educators, journalists, diplomats, bureaucrats and theologians spoke to us on some of the subjects occupying the news in Israel.

Alongside tourism, diamonds and high technology, generating news is Israel's greatest industry.

Every day, every hour, people tune into the news. Every cluster of people, whether "queuing" for a bus or idling over coffee, is instantly transformed into a highly energized, finger-waving debating society at the mere drop of a seemingly inocuous comment directed to no one in particular.

This is a highly individualistic society where opinions flow as freely as chocolate spread between two pieces of bread. Because everyone's children are soldiers, no news is irrelevant. People live constantly on the edge of "the most recent developments." But, as one former Canadian now working here in public relations told me, "It can wear you down."

The first day of the conference was devoted to two themes: Israeli Society After the Assassination, and Tomorrow's Jerusalem. Speaking on the former were Israel Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, Hebrew University professor Ehud Sprinzak and Jewish Agency chair, Avraham Burg.

Rabbi Lau is an orator. In a deep sonorous voice, he turns light Hebrew phrases into sharp images of fine light. Pleading his case before the bar of his conscience, he summoned the people of Israel to return to the core values: unity, Zionism and love for each other.

Sprinzak set about debunking three "post-assassination" myths concerning Israeli society: Israeli democracy is now seriously endangered; a powerful radical right wing is ascending in Israeli life; and society is on the brink of breaking apart.

He minced no words. Rather than being in a situation of danger, he said, Israeli democracy is working well. The assassination was an act of weakness, of desperation. It was not an act committed out of power of strength.

Nor is a violent, radical right beginning to flourish in Israeli society. Sprinzak was adamant that only a few dozen people from the five percent of the population comprising the radical right are inclined to violence. They are a "collectivity in distress." Their use of inflammatory language is an attempt "to get the government to respond to their emotional fears."

The radical right has been traumatized by the murder no less than the majority of Israelis, he said. Their rhetoric has since become "neutralized." Moreover, Sprinzak said, the two main ideologies are seeking more common ground. Yossi Beilin is now speaking to the settlers in the settlers' homes. And the Yesha council, by proclaiming public support for Benjamin Netanyahu, has decided to join the mainstream of the political process.

But Sprinzak did not minimize the potential harm that even a very small number of people could cause. Thus, he concluded his remarks by urging the radical right wing in Israel to ostracize and marginalize the potentially violent few from within their midst.

Burg brought an additional perspective to that small handful of people whom Sprinzak had identified as potentially violent. Without any hesitation or ambiguity, he stated that there was, unfortunately, "a spiritual infrastructure for a Jewish fundamentalism, which amounts to a kind of Jewish jihadism."

His main point though, was that the competing ideologies "must look for a set of rules to determine how to conduct their disagreements. It is vital to construct a national consensus over troubled national waters."

Ironically, while Sprinzak and Burg were speaking to us, one of the most violent demonstrations in recent Jerusalem history was taking place outside the prime minister's residence.

As most readers probably know by now, thousands of Israelis from Ethiopia had gathered to protest the disclosure that Magen David Adom had simply thrown away most of the blood which members of their community had donated over the years. More than 70 people had been hurt in the demonstration.

The "blood" disclosure was only the ostensible reason for the demonstration. The real reason, according to the demonstration's organizers, was to protest the impact of years of discrimination felt by the community. The "blood" incident was simply the final insult, and as a headline in the Jerusalem Post noted, it was "too much to bear."

Later that same evening, in a press conference with the visiting international media, Prime Minister Shimon Peres reiterated his profound apologies to the Ethiopian community.

"I am very sorry for the injury that we committed to them," he said. "I ask them to accept my apology. What happened [regarding the discarded blood] was not so much a result of policy as a result of bad judgment and mistake."

Earlier in the day, Peres had met with the leaders of the community and appointed a commission of inquiry to look into the "blood donations" matter. Former president Yitzhak Navon subsequently agreed to chair the commission, and its mandate was expanded to include an examination into all aspects of government policies directed at Ethiopian immigrants.

This was the dominant news story of the week. It was front page every day, on talk shows, on radio, in newspapers, at the bus stops and in the coffee shops.

Next week, I'll gather my notes on the subject of Jerusalem. And this was only our first day at the conference.

Ex-cantor gets five years for sex-related charges

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former Metro lay cantor and synagogue official was sentenced last week to five years in prison on sex-related charges involving a minor.

Alain Oziel, 59, committed "terrible, horrible crimes done to an innocent child, by a man who abused his religion," said Justice Victor Paisley in passing sentence. 'It is harm that continues to this day."

Oziel, a one-time lay cantor and parnass at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation in Downsview, had been found guilty at trial in November of one count each of indecent assault, gross indecency and attempted buggery. He had pleaded not guilty to all charges.

"This is as serious as it gets," said Paisley, adding Oziel should serve "as an example to others: Don't do this crime."

Oziel's lawyer, Leo Adler, had asked for a suspended sentence because of his client's heart condition.

In his reasons for conviction, Paisley said the Moroccan-born Oziel "occupied a position of respect and responsibility in a religious community and a crime of a sexual nature is a most serious matter for a person in that position."

The charges stem from incidents in the early 1980s involving the teenaged son of a synagogue member. The victim's identity was sealed at trial.

Court heard that since his arrest, Oziel has been ostracized from the community and his large family.

In 1992, Oziel pleaded guilty to sexual assault concerning an incident between 1989 and 1992. He received a suspended sentence and three years probation.

It took the victim, now 28, over a decade to lay charges because he was in denial, he said at trial.

Crown counsel Margot McKinnon said Oziel was "a respected member of the synagogue, giving religious instruction. He was a trusted, older person who had religious influence over a young boy. He played the role of teacher and confidant. And he abused the community's trust."

Oziel had testified at trial that he gave religious instruction, but not to children.

Court heard that Oziel got to know the boy, who was from an observant family, at age 12 when the boy came to synagogue to prepare for his bar mitzvah. The two would have breakfast together several times a week and Oziel, a typesetter by trade, even taught him how to drive and typeset. Oziel spoke to the boy a great deal about sex to prepare him for manhood, according to testimony.

The abuse took place mainly in Oziel's workplace and involved masturbation, oral sex and other sex acts. They continued until the boy was 14. At one point, following a dance at the synagogue, Oziel took the boy to a prostitute, court was told.

Later, Oziel made the boy read a Hebrew passage of forgiveness, court heard.

According to testimony, he told the boy, "as long as there's no intercourse, you're not gay."

When the abuse ended, the boy avoided Oziel, even though the two saw each other often at synagogue, testimony stated.

The victim wept at sentencing. McKinnon noted that at the trial, he let out a "cry of anguish" the likes of which she had never heard.

Paisley said the victim's cries were like "when loved ones try to throw themselves into graves. It's that deep."

The judge noted that Oziel was "a leader" in the synagogue, who would "select people to pray and lead the congregation in singing." But his interests "went well beyond those of a religious leader."

As for the victim, "it took a brave person to come forward."

An employee of Petah Tikva told The CJN that Oziel had been a cantor there and "always" led services about a decade ago, but that he has not been a member "for two or three years."

Oziel has applied for bail pending an appeal.

Nemsila decision expected soon

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge has promised a quick decision in the case involving alleged Nazi war criminal Joseph Nemsila.

The Nemsila case wound up last week after interveners for four Jewish organizations presented arguments why Nemsila, convicted in the former Czechoslovakia for war crimes, could not be protected from deportation by having acquired Canadian domicile.

Nemsila's lawyer, Barbara Jackman, had argued that under Canada's old Immigration Act, Nemsila acquired domicile after living here for five years and was immune from deportation — even if he misrepresented pertinent facts about his wartime activities when he entered Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress lawyer Ed Morgan said it is illogical for Nemsila, who does not have citizenship, to have greater rights than someone who had obtained Canadian citizenship. That person can be stripped of his citizenship and deported.

Such an outcome is inconsistent with the equality provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The way to correct the situation is by removing the exemption from deportation for people with domicile, he argued.

Other interveners who addressed the court were David Matas representing B'nai Brith Canada, John B. Laskin on behalf of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and Ken Narvey for the Montreal-based Coalition of Concerned Congregations.

They argued that domicile cannot be acquired fraudulently or by misrepresenting key information.

Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe argued that because Nemsila misrepresented his activities, he was never lawfully admitted to Canada and subsequently could not legally obtain domicile.

Nemsila is one of five alleged Nazi war criminals who federal authorities are attempting to remove from Canada. Three of the others are Canadian citizens while a fifth, Antanas Kenstavicius, like Nemsila is not a citizen. That case is on hold pending a decision by the judge in the Nemsila case.

Droege back in court

TORONTO — Wearing chains and leg irons, Wolfgang Droege, the leader of the white supremacist Heritage Front (HF) was led into court last week to answer charges he violated a consent order against offering hateful messages on the telephone.

Droege was brought to court from the Toronto (Don) Jail, where he is serving a sentence for aggravated assault in a case that arose out of a wild downtown melee involving members of the Heritage Front and anti-racists.

This time, Droege, the Heritage Front and June French, the voice on the HF's answering machine, are alleged to have recorded a message accusing the Jewish community of vengeance by pulling old men out of retirement homes and off respirators to have them charged with war crimes.

The message, which ran in February 1995, prompted a complaint to the Canadian Human Rights Commission by Canadian Jewish Congress, said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber.

Congress, along with the Native Canadian Centre, laid the initial complaint against Droege and the Heritage Front when it ran a message insulting Native anti-racist leader Rodney Bobiwash, Farber said.

That complaint led to a consent order of the court in which the Heritage Front promised not to offer telephone messages that expose people to hatred or contempt.

Congress believes the new message is anti-Semitic and violates the earlier consent order, he added.

A decision has been reserved in the case.

Consultant conceived of Yad BeYad volunteer program

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Five years ago, the international volunteer program Yad BeYad (Hand in Hand), which offers English classes to olim in Israel, was still a pipe dream; and the Canada-Israel Forum, which sponsors its first one-day conference this Sunday, had yet to be dreamed up.

The woman who launched them both began with "a tremendous urge" to respond to Israel's difficulties in absorbing new olim, particularly musicians, scientists and doctors from the former Soviet Union.

A career management consultant by profession, South African-born Loretta Helman, now 52, knew she had the expertise to help.

On her return from a 1991 United Jewish Appeal mission to Israel, she drafted a proposal for the program which was to become Yad BeYad.

Nobody to whom she wrote replied, but an acquaintance, hearing of her idea, suggested she contact the Israeli Forum.

Indeed the Tel Aviv-based nonpolitical organization, which fosters absorption of olim and ties between Israeli and Diaspora Jews, turned out to be just what she was seeking.

Today the Israeli Forum does some of the Yad BeYad administrative work in Israel and provides funding along with the Jewish Agency and the eight municipalities where the program is run.

Now entering its fifth year, Yad BeYad serves more than 1,000 adult students over two two-week sessions every summer. In 1992, there were 130 students and 20 teachers.

Loretta Helman

Last year, 104 volunteers took part in the program — individuals from Canadian cities such as Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa, and groups from Toronto, Boston, Chicago and Memphis.

The volunteers comprise a broad spectrum of Jewish backgrounds, from observant to secular, as well as non-Jews.

"People are all working for a common purpose. It's so exhilarating," says Helman.

A phone call from a potential volunteer in New Jersey interrupts the interview. Helman has even had inquiries from Alaska, and a number of volunteers have joined the program from England.

To organize a group, "you have to find this crazy person like me," laughs Helman.

Crazy? Maybe. Dedicated? Definitely.

"Yad BeYad takes up such a huge amount of my time, but it's not enough. We want to have a presence here," she says.

Shortly after Yad BeYad got off the ground, Helman did establish a local presence in the form of the Canada-Israel Forum, one of a small number of Diaspora affiliates of the Israeli Forum and the nonprofit umbrella group (a term Helman prefers to the more bureaucratic "organization") for activities such as Yad BeYad and the upcoming "mini-Moriah" conference being held this weekend at Baycrest Terrace.

Helman was inspired to create the conference, entitled Windows 5756: You Show Me Your Israel ... I'll Show You Mine!, after attending the Israeli Forum's three-day Moriah conference held in Israel every 18 months.

"It was a uniting kind of force," she recalls of the intensive program which brings together Jews from around the world.

The mini-Moriah (for which registration closes Feb. 8), is aimed — like its international counterpart — at promoting understanding through dialogue.

The opening panel will feature Middle East analyst Shira Herzog and Haifa University sociologist Eugene Weiner. Participants will be able to attend two of three workshops on various aspects of a changing Israel and our diverse perceptions of the country. Workshop facilitators are Allan Reitzes, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto; Baruch Gur, Jewish Agency shaliach; economists Jack Mintz and Eli Katz; Zac Kaye, director, Central Campus Services of Greater Toronto; and sociologist Rina Cohen.

Nineteen students from York are studying in Jerusalem, another five at Tel Aviv University, and others at a number of other universities, yeshivot and special seminars. A number of the students were awarded scholarships from York to pursue their studies abroad. The York group at the Hebrew University gathered in Jerusalem for a reunion with Prof. Michael Brown, the director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies who was visiting in Israel. Seen here is the group Vidal Bekerman, Joshua Blinick, Debra Cohen, Michelle Cohen, Jessica Feldman, Ronny Felsen, Zev Gitalis, Aaron Goldman, Yuri Hronsky, Jody Kasner, Gillian Kirsh, Judi Levy-Bencheton, Dana Moskowitz and Michael Noble.

Orthodox woman works in prisons

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The supply manifest for the hostage teams in the Central Ohio prison system has one unusual component.

Along with the expected guns, walkie-talkies and writing material, there is the notation "one teichel."

That is because a member of that team is Barbara Abrams, a psychologist who is also an Orthodox Jew.

The teichel is necessary, she explained to the opening lecture at Flaming the Fire From Within, Aish HaTorah's third annual women's day, because the communication device which monitors all conversations would tear her sheitl.

While Orthodoxy and prison work appear to be incompatible, Abrams, who has worked for over five years in Ohio prisons, said that she has not in fact found that to be the case.

This is partly because she has treated the requirements of Orthodoxy, such as not working on Shabbat, matter-of-factly and with confidence.

"I had my schedule, which had me working from 7 to 4:30 Monday to Thursday, and 7 to 11 on Friday, written into my contract from the first. I just walked in and gave them the times, and said either you accommodate me or don't hire me. They said OK."

In an often hilarious talk, she described other problems one might not think of, such as the metal combs in her sheitl setting off the metal detectors and asking her rabbi how to dress for unarmed combat classes, not to mention dealing with the injunction against touching someone of the opposite sex. (He told her to do whatever she had to do — her life might depend on knowing how to defend herself.)

She admitted that in an atmosphere of potential violence, drugs, manipulation and coarseness, it would have been easy to lose her spirituality, just as it would have been easy for her marriage and other personal relationships to disintegrate under the strain.

After a fairly short time working in the prison system, "I realized that I was at the beginning of the vortex — things were starting to suck me in."

What she decided to do, she said, was to say her morning prayers in her office before she starts to work, and her evening prayers as soon as she gets home.

"Davening puts me in order," she said. "Because I'm religious, I constantly have to check to make sure I'm on the centre line. I have to think about what my priorities are. During davening, I especially concentrate on those parts about dealing with other people."

She also had trouble with other Jews, who feared her being a bad influence on their families.

"I spoke to the Bostoner rebbe. He said that I was serving humanity, and if any of your friends give you trouble, have them call me. That solved the problem."

The day-long program, also included workshops on improving relationships, dealing with difficulties, and prayer, and a speech by New York lecturer and author Rabbi Moshe Weinberger.

MOSAIC MURAL

Artist Ian Leventhal and participants are seen painting a mosaic mural of some 200 wooden tiles in celebration of the 3,000th anniversary of the conquest of Jerusalem by King David. The event took place at the CBC Building in Toronto and will ultimately be a gift to the city of Jerusalem. The event was sponsored by the New Leadership Group of The Jerusalem Foundation of Canada.

Put More Money In Your Pocket.

Borrowing Your RSP Contribution Can Actually SAVE You Money.

One of the few remaining ways Canadians can reduce the income tax they pay is by making contributions to an RSP. However, few of us have the cash required to make our maximum contribution.

By borrowing your maximum contribution, you can lower the amount of tax you pay now, and actually keep more of your hard earned money. Consider the following example.

John, age 30, has a maximum RSP contribution limit of $8,100. So far, he's only been able to save $2,100. Let's consider the benefits of John borrowing the additional $6,000 he needs to reach his limit.

Scenario #1

John decides not to borrow, leaving his total 1995 RSP contribution amount at $2,100. Assuming his combined federal and provincial tax rate is about 42%, his tax savings would be $882 (42% x $2,100). If his $2,100 RSP investment earns 10% per year over 25 years, it will grow to $23,000.

Scenario #2

John borrows the additional $6,000 to reach his goal of making his maximum contribution of $8,100. At his combined tax rate of 42%, his tax savings will be $3,402. If he receives this as a tax refund, he can reduce his loan immediately to $2,598.

$6,000	original amount borrowed
$3,402	less his tax refund amount applied to the loan
$2,598	new loan balance

John has also made a big difference in the value of his savings for his retirement years. By borrowing the $6,000 required to make his maximum contribution, John's $8,100 contribution, earning 10%, will have grown to $88,000 at age 55. That's $65,000 more than if he only contributed $2,100! That's the power of borrowing your maximum contribution.

We'll prepare an RSP loan for you in twenty minutes. Visit your local branch for more details.

Peace in the Mideast

The peace process in the Middle East is working, despite a jumble of unresolved problems and disheartening, disgusting spasms of terrorism. Skeptics have issued dire warnings that the Oslo accords endanger Israel's vital interests and even imperil its very existence. But this claim is basically myopic and does not withstand scrutiny.

Judging by recent developments, Israel's faith in peacemaking is not misplaced. On Jan. 22, after interminable delays, Israel and Tunisia finally took the first step toward establishing full diplomatic relations. Tunisia is the third North African Arab country to have entered into peaceful relations with Israel, having been preceded by Egypt and Morocco. (Israel and Mauritania — a member of the Arab League on the western edge of the Maghreb — announced a mutual recognition agreement last year.)

On Jan. 28, Oman signed an accord with Israel under which commercial interest offices will be opened in Tel Aviv and Muscat. With the stroke of a pen, Oman thus became the first Arab state in the Persian Gulf to establish formal ties with Israel.

To Israel's satisfaction, there has been movement on the Palestinian front as well. Israel and its partner, the PLO, have promulgated two major agreements since the 1993 Declaration of Principles; the Palestinians in the territories have elected a transitional self-governing council.

Talks between Israel and Syria — the key to unlocking wider Arab recognition of Israel and deflating tensions in southern Lebanon — are proceeding in the United States. These protracted deliberations are not expected to bear fruit any time soon. Nevertheless, Israel and the United States have concluded that Syria has taken a strategic decision to pursue a peaceful resolution of its conflict with Israel.

Israel's peace treaty with Jordan, a spinoff of the Oslo accords, is thriving, notwithstanding dissident voices in Amman. King Hussein, who completed a triumphant tour of Tel Aviv in January, has made good on his promise to establish a framework of warm relations with Israel.

The accords with the PLO, Jordan, Morocco, Mauritania, Tunisia and Oman have served Israel well. They have defused the Arab-Israeli dispute, have been a harbinger of further peace treaties with Arab states, have largely eliminated the chances of another war, have ended the intifadah, have laid the foundation for a true Israeli/Palestinian rapprochement, have marginalized Arab radicals and have significantly weakened the Arab economic boycott.

Moreover, the promising new climate in the Middle East has had a beneficial effect on Israel's international profile. Sixty three nations have restored or forged diplomatic relations with Israel since the 1991 Madrid peace conference, and Israel's relationship with the United Nations has vastly improved. Furthermore, the peace process has helped fuel high levels of growth in the Israeli economy and pried open lucrative markets in Asia.

Although the Oslo accords have worked far better than some would have imagined, the road to a stable Middle East, with peace and security for all, is paved with thorns.

Palestinian terrorists have exacted a heavy toll in life and limb on Israel, and will surely try to do so again. However, the Palestine National Authority has belatedly come to the realization that terrorism is inimical to wider Palestinian interests. And now, without further ado, it is incumbent on the PLO to live up to its solemn pledge and annul clauses in its national covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

In May, when Israel and the PLO sit down for final status talks to discuss such crucial matters as Jewish settlements, Jerusalem, water rights and borders, the hardest part of the negotiations will begin. But if both sides bring goodwill, sensitivity and foresight to the historic meetings, which are scheduled to wind down in 1999, they can usher in the new millennium on a most auspicious note. — S.K.

Adulation of Yahya Ayyash frightening

Other than a handful of lunatic ultra-religious fanatics, no Jew nor Israeli applauded Baruch Goldstein's massacre of 29 Muslim worshippers in Hebron. It is therefore frightening to see thousands and thousands of Muslims mourning the death of the despicable and cowardly Yahya Ayyash. It is mind boggling that a political science professor at Gaza's Islamic University should remark that the people appreciate what this man, this hero, has done for them. And further, that a so-called man of God would preach and pray from a mosque for the creation of 1001 like Yahya.

Even PLO Chairman, Yasser Arafat, failed to condemn the atrocious deeds of the bomb maker. The unabashed pride of Ayyash's accomplishments by his family is sickening. If all of this represents the mind set of the people of Gaza and its leadership, academic, religious and political, then the road to peace will be strewn with bloodshed and hatred for a long time to come.

Questions super teaching hospital idea

Your column "In and around Montreal" (CJN, Jan. 18, Montreal edition) intrigued me because while the existence of a Medical and Health Services Division of CJA makes good sense, it should not lend itself to ideas which may be offensive.

The concept of "one super teaching hospital — that will prompt health care professionals to become more focused on their patients," admired by Dr. Abraham Fuks, Dean of Medicine at McGill University, is not widely accepted by physicians or the public because smaller hospitals are a preferred atmosphere for both resident training and patient care. Indeed, most people were horrified to learn that this unpopular proposal was associated with the announced closing of several excellent community hospitals in Montreal, including one with teaching status at McGill.

I question the wisdom of the University in putting forward a proposal for its own mega-hospital in the face of Government cutbacks in health care, and suggest that it has more to do with the defence of its large teaching hospitals than with concerns for the improved quality of care.

One way to honor Jewish veterans

The item regarding the concerns of the Jewish and Islamic communities about the symbols for Remembrance Day used in Winnipeg schools took me back a few years to when I was on staff with the Scarborough Board of Education in Metro Toronto.

I taught my choir of grades 5 and 6 students (no Jews), the English version of Eli, Eli (words by Hannah Senesh), and it became the hymn for Nov. 11 program for many years. (We also sang, In Flanders Field.)

What peace will do for Israel

The Arab-Israeli Peace Accord has numerous benefits, one of which is security and expansion of the Israeli economy. With the first autonomous Palestinian elections last week, it appears that the peace between the Palestinians and Israelis is already producing tangible results. Israel was politically unstable for so many years that few countries would agree to enter into long-term relations with them. Yet with the peace in Israel and proof that peace will be maintained and guarded, the land of milk and honey appears open for business.

Now, Canada and Israel have signed a free trade agreement, which will be mutually beneficial for both parties. The tariffs will be removed July 1 and Israel will focus its attention on investors in the agricultural, construction and hi-tech sectors of its economy. The increased stability that Israel will enjoy as a result of the peace that Rabin labored for and that Peres is continuing to refine, will bring more than the end to a long struggle. Peace is paying off for Israel by providing the political stability it needs in order for other countries to trust its economy and invest there.

Ontario government's remedy worse than the disease

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Excerpted from his address at the Interfaith Social Action Reform Coalition Conference, Toronto, Nov. 2, 1995.

Meir Tamari, the recognized authority on Jewish business ethics and related matters, from whom I have learnt much, writes: "[Judaism] possesses characteristics that in part are similar to those associated with socialism, and yet others often similar to those in free market operations." And he adds: "This is neither surprising nor problematical. After all, Judaism is not an economic system, but a spiritual and moral value structure, within which economic activity takes place and is formed into a pattern of holiness."

It is this background that prompts me to suggest that now, when we have sampled the bitter taste of The Common Sense Revolution in Ontario, many of us — defenders and detractors alike — will come to realize what we may have only surmised before, namely that the document, and the way it is being implemented, will have far-reaching repercussions for the very fabric of our society. In many ways, the triumph of this document illustrates what happens to society when religion is relegated to the private realm, where God sense is banished from common sense.

And that is, of course, most emphatically, a religious concern, relevant to all faiths. In the best tradition of the Hebrew prophets, which Jews share with their Christian neighbors, as religious leaders, we are called upon to react the way Amos or Jeremiah might have reacted in similar circumstances. We must testify to the word of God, whether it is expedient or not. Two particular characteristics of such a response come to mind.

First, the prophets always made a point of telling people what ought to be, not what will be. They were — in Dean Inge's felicitous phrase — forthtellers, not foretellers Or as the late John Robinson described them, the prophets were radicals in the literal sense — they went to the root of things — and even when they proclaimed the doom of Jerusalem, they wept for it. We, too, must speak what we believe to be true, but never without love and care for those whom we criticize.

Second, the Hebrew prophets were partisan. They took the side of the poor and the disadvantaged. They did not claim to be objective; they only claimed to be right, because they spoke the word of God. As a result, they judged society not by the way it provided for the powerful, but by the way it dealt with the downtrodden.

But it is to the heirs of the prophets, the Pharisees — whom exponents of Christianity have for so long and so unjustly despised — that I turn for the first substantive part of these reflections.

We read in Pirkei Avot the following: "There are four character types among people. One who says, 'What is mine is mine and what is yours is yours,' is of average character, and others say this is the characteristic of Sodom; one who says, 'What is mine is yours and what is yours is mine,' is an ignoramous; one who says, 'What is mine is yours and what is yours is yours,' is a pious person; one who says, 'What is yours is mine and what is mine is mine,' is a wicked person."

We need not concern ourselves here with the wicked, the pious or the foolish. But the first of the four is relevant in our context: "One who says 'What is mine is mine and what is yours is yours.' " This character is, understandably, described as "average," possessing what we might call common sense.

"If you extend your soul to the hungry ... your light will rise in the darkness ..." (Isaiah 58:10)

And then comes the second opinion: "This is the characteristic of Sodom." When applied to our situation now, the issue seems to be this: Is the doctrine of "mine is mine," which seems to be behind the thinking of The Common Sense Revolution, the accepted view of ordinary — "average" — folk, which the government of Ontario has been entrusted to implement, or is it, in fact, the way of Sodom?

The reference in our text is not to the Sodom of sexual misconduct but to a sentence in The Book of Ezekiel: "Only this was the sin of your sister Sodom: arrogance! She and her daughters had plenty of bread and untroubled tranquillity; yet she did not support the poor and the needy." (16;49) This sounds much closer to home, does it not? Many commentators to the passage in the Mishnah take up the theme. Let me quote but four.

First, R. Travers Herford (1860-1950), a Unitarian theologian who devoted his life to the study of Judaism and who was the first among non-Jewish scholars to offer an informed, positive view of the Pharisees. He writes: "There is of course no implication that ordinary men are as wicked as those of Sodom. The author of the remark ... probably meant to express his strong dissent from the view that the rule of 'each for himself' was the one followed by the average man. That rule was the most intensely selfish of the four mentioned, because it denied all relation whatever between a man and his fellow men, and left each shut up in himself."

Next, Irving Bunim, a contemporary American-Jewish teacher, who makes an important distinction between poor people — "average" folk holding on to their own — and the rich using the "mine is mine" formula: "But should a rich man make this his motto and say, 'I will hold on to what is mine, and let others be satisfied with the little they have' — if it makes people neglect the needs of others — this course is precisely the way of Sodom that forbade its people on pain of death to feed any person or passing stranger."

Which brings me to the third reflection on the same statement in Avot, this one by Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka of Ottawa, a well-known and respected teacher of Judaism: "The exactitude with which such a statement is made and the insistence that there can never be sharing — that what is mine must always be mine, what is yours must always be yours, I will not give to you and you do not give to me — can create a syndrome of insensitivity, of non-communication, of non-concern, which eventually leads to hardness, callousness and total disregard of the other individual, even producing the inability to help — and eventually the desire to harm. The attitude of 'What is mine is mine and what is yours is yours' creates a progression of depersonalization from which all types of human cruelty can emanate."

That is our nightmare. We fear that, though they are in themselves at times laudable, the common sense efforts to reduce fiscal deficit will create a moral deficit with much more devastating implications, both in the short and in the long term. We are afraid that the remedy is worse than the disease. Therefore, emulating the prophets of old, we feel compelled to warn against the dangers behind the words. Though The Common Sense Revolution promises not to cut education, health care and safety from criminals, the impact of the overall cuts is already affecting these three areas and, therefore, is likely to do untold damage to our society.

Even if the evidence of current opinion polls brings comfort to those in power, we, like the biblical prophets, must alert public opinion that "they offer healing offhand for the wounds of My people, saying 'Shalom, shalom All is well, all is well;' v'eyn shalom when nothing is well." (Jeremiah 6;14) This kind of populism constitutes a threat to every society; the fact that previous governments may not have done better should give us no comfort.

But it does bring me to the fourth and final comment, this one from Meir Tamari: "However, what made it necessary to destroy Sodom was not the individual selfishness of its citizens, but the fact that this had become an integral part of its communal culture. While a society can exist with cruel and selfish individuals, the moral decay that sets in when cruelty and callousness become hallmarks of that society marks it for Divine retribution.

Though it would be premature to lapse into a rhetoric that suggests that a few months of the effects of The Common Sense Revolution have brought us to this situation, it is not too early to warn against the possible consequences in the long term and, even more important, to look at the value system, rather than just the words, behind the document.

The value system that informs my spiritual life is based on the Psalmist's assertion that "the earth is the Lord's and all that it holds, the world and its inhabitants." (Psalms 24;1) This is not only a standard text in most expositions of the religious perspective on ecology, but also a compelling refutation of the notion of "mine is mine" — because everything is the Lord's. To share of what is mine with you, because you have less than I, is an act of imitatio dei. A passage in the Talmud tells how, despite the unbridgeable distance between God and humanity, it is possible for humans to imitate God: Just as God is merciful, so must humans be merciful; just as God is kind and righteous, so humans should be kind and righteous; just as God looks after all the creatures in the world, so must we.

Common sense — "What is mine is mine and what is yours is yours" — encounters God sense. The imperative to imitate God in order to be fully human — to be whole, to be holy — stands in sharp contrast to the notion of "mine is mine." And God sense as imitatio dei can only become operative in society through the instrument of justice.

But rather than regarding wealth as evidence of our own achievements due to our own merits, we are called to look upon it as a sign of divine grace, bestowed on us in order to call us to responsibility. Tamari writes: "The wealth provided therefore by Him [God], although meant primarily for the satisfaction of the needs and wants of the private owner, is also meant to be used to satisfy the needs of the poor and the inefficient — the old, the weak, and even the lazy. Just as business morality needs to be legislated, so too does this mutual assistance. If left to the philanthropy of the individual and to his acts of kindness, human nature and the lust for wealth would limit this act of sharing. So society acquires a property right in the wealth of the individual, to provide, through compulsory acts of taxation, the social and charitable needs of its members. These funds are either tzedakah (charity) or tzedek (justice). Voluntary sharing of wealth in response to claims of the poor and weak is charity, but compulsory participation in the communal funds to provide these needs is an act of justice. Non-participation in such funding becomes tantamount to theft, either from the recipients of the funding or from the other participants who now have to provide a greater share."

Without wishing to make common cause in any way whatsoever with those who dream of a theocracy in our midst, we must nevertheless reflect on the prospect of doom that comes from Godlessness, of the threat of disintegration when common sense is elevated to the level of God sense, and when religious institutions are only recognized as benevolent do-gooders and told to pick up the pieces from the damage done by Government.

Why Israel needs Western aliyah now

The world and its media keep hectoring Israel to take risks for peace. Present Israeli risks include troop withdrawal from five Palestinian cities, henceforth a potential refuge for terrorists; elections which virtually assure a Palestinian state with borders which may be unsafe; suffering in silence Yasser Arafat's claims to Jerusalem as his future state's capital and — this at Christmas in Bethlehem! — to Jesus as a Palestinian; even the possibility, unthinkable not long ago, of withdrawal from that fortress of Israeli security, the Golan Heights. What other country ever took such risks for what is after all, not yet peace but only a peace process? Left and right may disagree on the gravity of the risk, but no honest person can wish it away.

By Emil Fackenheim

But for Time magazine more hectoring is necessary. A lead story on Palestinians in Lebanon (Jan. 15) retells why these refugees are in camps still: they are not allowed either to become Lebanese or to return to Israel, but only to visit there. In Time's retelling, a Palestinian woman does just that, visiting her former home in a village near Haifa, now occupied by a Jewish family from Yemen. Invited in for coffee, she breaks into tears, but is comforted by her hostess: "God willing, you will return to this house and I will return to my house in Yemen."

Return to Yemen? (A friend of mine asks: "Where on earth did Time dig this one up?") From Yemen Jews quite literally fled on their feet, arriving at freedom, if at all, as "walking skeletons." (Thus Howard Sachar, a respected historian, frequently critical of Israel.) If Jews can — ought to? — return to Yemen, they can — ought to — return anywhere. Time has chosen the precise moment when Israel is taking risks some consider too high for using its inimitable way — who can resist a human interest story, let alone this one? — to delegitimate the entire Zionist enterprise. A just peace must include these refugees (a subject for a future letter); but Jews returning to their "houses" in Yemen is hardly justice.

President Ezer Weizman chose the same moment as Time's to make possibly the most eloquent Zionist speech ever made. At the right place, too: the German Bundestag. Identifying himself with the Jewish "wandering" through the "200 generations [that] have passed since Abraham left his birthplace and went to the land that is today my land," he stressed, "the 150 generations [that] went by between the pillars of fire of the Exodus from Egypt and the columns of smoke of the Holocaust." His climax: "We respect the states neighboring us and their cultures, but in our own way and in adherence to our own values and our culture."

The Bundestag needed that speech. So did the German people. So did Jews in Germany, as the president said he could not understand how they could live there, not in Israel. And what of European politicians, most patronizing as they are among those hectoring Israel? Last but not least, that speech should be distributed throughout Israel.

After half a century of siege and war with enemies, and hectoring and pressuring from half-hearted friends, Israelis are tired. So is their Zionism, as expressed in "post-Zionism," "economic Zionism" and similar euphemisms. Having held the Zionist fort for so long, Israelis need Western immigrants whose Zionism is not tired — such as Ruth Matar and her daughter-in-law Nadia, the one a grandmother, the other the young mother of three.

Ruth and Nadia head Women in Green, mostly from the West, former Democrats and Republicans, presently Labor and Likud, of many opinions in religion and politics, but at one (to cite their name) "for Israel's tomorrow." One reporter found them "the most authentic and popular resistance movement ... here over the past few years." He would love to argue with them, he added.

I did not argue with Ruth and Nadia. To be with them was enough. These two Jewish women of valor left me, often discouraged these days, rejuvenated, wanting to dance the Horah or do something similarly Zionist, innocent and juvenile. I had been, as it were, in the presence of the Zionist conscience of Israel.

Have brush, will travel

I am sure you have often seen the picture: some earnest looking woman or man, face shielded by a big sun-screen hat, kneeling before some inanimate object and attacking it with something that looks like a little brush for painting water color pictures. Then you read the caption, which informs you that the photograph depicts an archeologist gently exhuming a priceless artifact. Whereupon you turn to other, more lively news.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Well, look again. What the image portrays is, in fact, a sleuthing effort to unravel mysteries of the past. And if you have any interest at all in history, then you should take a second look at archeology.

In Israel, it's one of the most popular pastimes, which is easy to understand. For there, history has an impact on the present; every town and village speaks of its origins. You only have to look to the ground to find your roots, literally. I still remember attending a lecture by Yigal Yadin, the nation's best known archeologist/politician/general, whose father, Eliezer Sukenik, was one who brought the Dead Sea Scrolls to the world's attention. I came early, but the hall was already filled.

I even had my own experience in the field, limited as it was. It happened 40 years ago. I was then a rabbi in Minnesota and was on semi-sabbatical leave. My wife and I, along with our two young children, were taking a stroll along the Caesarea beach. At that time, there had not as yet been any excavations in the area; the country had other problems. The Suez crisis was about to erupt, and our family foursome were among the rare visitors that summer.

The beach was empty and we soon were intrigued by the broken shards that were lying all around. It did not take an expert to recognize that this was old stuff, and a little poking around unearthed parts of jars, fossilized bird bones and the like. We had no spade or any tool, except some sticks with which we poked around. Unprepared though we were, we all felt suddenly connected to the mysteries of ages gone by.

The memory of that morning in Caesarea has never left me, and every time I open the pages of Biblical Archeology Review the fascination returns. There is rarely an issue that does not tell me of new finds and insights.

Which brings me to telling you of an opportunity. Maybe there are a few readers of this column who have wondered whether they could join in a dig. Well, you can, and do so as an amateur. There are dozens of opportunities to participate in a program sponsored by the Israel Archeological Society for this coming summer. For instance, you might want to dig at Tel Beth-She'an. This was the city where the Philistines displayed the heads of King Saul and his son Jonathan. King David finally conquered the town, which already then had a long history. The search is now on for evidence of Bronze or Iron Age traces.

In case you are interested in any dig, write to Israel Archeological Society, 467 Levering Ave., Los Angeles, Ca. 90024; phone 800-177-2358 or 310-472-9449; fax 310-476-6259; e-mail ias@interramp.com

Jerusalem and the peace process

By DAVID HARTMAN

Throughout history, Jerusalem has been a symbol of God's stake in human history. For the three major monotheistic faiths, Judaism, Christianity and Islam, Jerusalem was a powerful symbol of God's concern with history and of the redemptive scheme which would vindicate the beliefs of the one, true faith. There could be only one carrier of the truth. Gaining control of Jerusalem meant gaining control of the secret to God's redemptive design for history.

By David Hartman

The history of monotheism in general, and the history of Jerusalem in particular, have been histories of holy wars and conflicts, because of this belief in the exclusivity of God's plan for realizing the grand scheme of human history. Christianity thus claimed to be the heir of Judaism, and Islam the heir of both Judaism and Christianity. Each faith viewed the other as its enemy — the enemy of religious truth as such.

The question that must be faced today is whether this was the inevitable consequence of the religious framework rooted in the biblical tradition? Is fundamentalism with its single-truth, absolutist claim the necessary legacy of Jerusalem for the modern world?

In total contrast to this orientation, I have devoted my life to trying to show that the Jewish return to Jerusalem can be viewed, not as yet another attempt at capturing the universal, but as a return to the particular. Ours is the return of the eldest son, the rejected son, the son who was excluded from sharing in the blessing.

Jewish homelessness and exile had been interpreted as signs of Divine rejection and as the vindication of the Christian doctrine of the New Covenant. Israel's homelessness was theologically necessary in order to confirm the truth of the gospel proclaiming the "good news" of the arrival of the New Israel.

I deeply believe that the world has passed beyond that type of triumphalism and is ready for a new appreciation of religious pluralism.

Jerusalem is the ingathering of a people to its home after years of separation and wandering. This idea is the cornerstone for building genuine peace in the Middle East. Viewing Israel as a post-Holocaust phenomenon makes the State of Israel into a passing historical episode. It is crucial, therefore, that Christians and Muslims understand what Jews mean when they say: We are home.

The non-Jewish world must know that we are no longer wandering Jews suffering because of the curse of a rejecting God. We are no longer the persecuted victims of history. We are strong and healthy and weak and vulnerable like all ordinary human beings. Unless you begin to see us in a new way, the demon of triumphalism will continue to be monotheism's legacy to the world.

When Islam and Christianity recognize our coming home, we will have no difficulty making room for them. When you are a stranger, you cannot welcome guests. When you know you are at home, you can.

Lasting peace is thus connected to the world's acknowledging the Jewish people's claim to be returning to their home, to the home that was so deeply embedded in their souls for over 2,000 years. This is what makes the issue of Jerusalem an integral part of the peace process.

Jerusalem always played an important role in the great story of Western culture, the Bible. Jerusalem is one of its central motifs. It is where the Temple stood, where the immanence of God was incarnated in its most concrete form. In contrast to the Greek philosophic notion of a historical idea of divinity wholly removed from the imperfections of matter and history, Jerusalem signified God's interest and involvement in human history. Jerusalem gave concrete expression to the biblical message that God had a stake in human history.

The biblical story is throughout informed by the principle that only one child inherits. The theme of the chosen versus the rejected recurs repeatedly throughout the Bible. One son gets the blessing while the other gets none. This motif still reverberates in the minds of those claiming to have inherited the biblical tradition. The logic of religious faith is either/or, either you are blessed or you are rejected. The story that created the promise of Jerusalem also created the curse of the eternal battle over Jerusalem.

I believe that our role as Jews today is to change this aspect of the story. We began the story and now we have come back to stay, our story has another part to it which states that God listens to many different songs and melodies. This is my dream and my hope for Jerusalem.

Canadian Soviet Jewry movement made a difference

Founded to expedite the orderly departure of Jews from the Soviet Union, the Soviet Jewry movement animated and inspired Jewish communities from Australia to Zaire from the early 1960s to the late 1980s.

By Sheldon Kirshner

It was a human rights cause which transcended class, ethnicity and religion, bringing together under one roof housewives and professors and Christians and Jews.

In Canada, the movement blossomed into a mighty network of interlocking organizations which, in the final analysis, truly made a difference.

"We helped change the Soviet Union's immigration policy," said Wendy Eisen, a Toronto woman who has written a comprehensive account of that movement, Count Us In (Burgher Books, $29.95). "We kept the issue on the West's political agenda."

Through protests, meetings and lobbying, the men and women of that movement were instrumental in persuading Moscow to moderate its policy. The gates were not opened at once. Indeed, there were moments when all seemed lost, when immigration levels were reduced to a trickle.

Yet, at the end of the day, the Soviet Jewry activists in the Diaspora triumphed. Moscow liberalized its heretofore rigid and capricious policy and, with it, literally hundreds of thousands of Jews were permitted to leave the country that had so oppressed them and their culture and religion.

In Canada, advocacy on behalf of Soviet Jews began in 1961, shortly after the first international conference on Soviet Jewry convened in Paris.

The movement here crystallized with a visit to Montreal by Meir Rosenne, an Israeli diplomat based in New York City. Until then, Canadians supportive of Soviet Jewry could be counted on one hand.

Among the few in Montreal were David Hartman, a rabbi, and Irwin Cotler, a McGill law student. Toronto had Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg and Nat Silver of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

From an uncoordinated effort spearheaded by individuals, the concern for Soviet Jews coalesced into a genuine grassroots movement. Eisen, in her thoroughly-documented book, describes its incremental development.

In the early 1960s, following the arrest of a Soviet rabbi, a nationwide conference of rabbis was formed to deal with the issue of Soviet Jewry in general. Later, in 1970, the movement was galvanized by a show trial in Leningrad.

In 1971, at the behest of some Toronto students, Russian-born Genya Intrator made the first of numerous telephone calls to Jews in the Soviet Union. Intrator, who became a key player in the movement, was a founder of the Women for Soviet Jewry committee.

The Canadian Committee for Soviet Jewry was established in 1972, shortly after Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin visited Canada. The Women's Campaign for Soviet Jewry, known as the 35s, emerged in Britain but chapters popped up in Canada and elsewhere.

Eisen, a McGill graduate, worked as a volunteer for the 35s in Montreal and in Toronto. She was attracted to the movement in 1974 after hearing a spellbinding speech by Yitzhak Rager, then the director of the Soviet Jewry desk at the Israeli Consulate in New York and now the mayor of Beersheva.

"I didn't know much about the movement before," she admitted. "I was too busy having babies."

Eisen, the former chair of Toronto's United Jewish Appeal, saw the movement as "a second chance." Her parents' generation had not done enough to try to stop the extermination of Jews in Europe, and in light of that tragedy, her generation had an obligation to rescue Soviet Jewry from what she calls a spiritual and cultural holocaust.

"We had a duty to speak out, not to remain silent," explained Eisen, whose grandparents were Russian Jews.

A modest person, she minimizes her contributions to the movement, content in the knowledge that she was merely "one of the players." Apart from her involvement with the 35s, Eisen taught a course on Soviet Jewry to sixth grade students at a Hebrew day school, published a booklet on Prisoners of Zion and travelled to the Soviet Union on several occasions to meet Refuseniks.

Looking back at a movement that was eclipsed by the Gorbachev era, Eisen said it bolstered her Jewish identity. Above all, however, it fostered a spirit of cooperation in the Jewish community.

As Eisen, a Reform Jew, put it: "Soviet Jewry was a unifying force for secular and Orthodox Jews. We had a common enemy." With the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin still fresh in her mind, she added: "It's tragic that we need a common enemy to be united."

Eisen is immensely proud of the movement's achievements, particularly in Canada. "We did more than our numbers would have warranted," she said.

There were times, especially in the mid-1980s, when a sense of despair engulfed its members. But neither Eisen nor her co-workers ever threw in the towel. "We were committed to these people," she said in reference to Soviet Jews. "We couldn't give up on them. It sounds trite, but we learned how to hold hands."

Eisen is generous in her praise of her fellow activists, citing the work of, among others, Intrator, Cotler, Barbara Stern, Jeanette Goldman, Dr. Gerald Batist and Sharon Wolfe.

Wolfe, her travelling companion to the Soviet Union, was "extremely important" to the movement.

As a special assistant in the Prime Minister's Office, she was in constant touch with parliamentarians — some of whom went to the Soviet Union on fact-finding missions sponsored by the Canadian Committee for Soviet Jewry — and with advocacy groups when they visited Ottawa.

Eisen started to write Count Us In in 1989, as the mass movement of Jews from the Soviet Union lurched forward.

"Operation Exodus put me out of a job," she said. "There was a void in my life."

Armed with a federal grant which enabled her to hire an assistant for four years, Eisen plunged into the task of writing what has turned out to be the first book about the movement in Canada. "I thought, 'Hey, I have a lot of good stories to tell.' "

There were voluminous files to draw upon, but Eisen fleshed out her research by interviewing scores of Soviet Jewry activists, each of whom gave her a new perspective on the subject.

"The story," she said, "was like a gigantic jigsaw puzzle, with everyone filling in a piece."

Finally, after six years of toil, she finished the manuscript. But to her great disappointment, 16 publishers rejected it before Joshua Samuel of Burgher Books accepted it.

Count Us In, which Eisen has personally promoted in a series of cross-Canada launchings, has exceeded Samuel's expectations. "The book has sold well so far," said Eisen, who no longer maintains contact with Jews in the countries which once comprised the Soviet Union.

In retrospect, she feels privileged to have been a member of a movement and of a generation which facilitated the immigration of more than 600,000 Soviet Jews to Israel and the West. "It strengthened my commitment to speaking out against injustices, no matter where they might occur," she observed.

With Count Us In a reality, Eisen is uncertain as to what the future may hold. "What am I going to do with the rest of my life?" she chuckled. "I haven't figured it out yet."

An eternal guidebook for a good life

By RABBI SHIMON DAVID BOUSKILA

The world and the Torah were developed in conjunction with one another, with the Torah intended as the eternal guidebook for a good life.

In order to give all of mankind the option of living according to the Torah's precepts, HaShem offered the Torah to each nation in the world. HaShem first approached the nation of Esav and asked, "Will you accept the Torah as the basis of your lifestyle?"

"What does the Torah contain?" they asked.

"One commandment is 'You shall not kill.' "

"No killing?" was the response. "But our entire existence is based on the permissibility of killing. We kill to live, and live to kill. If the Torah forbids killing, we cannot accept it."

HaShem then asked the nation of Yishmael if it would be willing to receive the Torah.

"What does the Torah contain?" asked Yishmael.

The Torah states, 'You shall not steal.'

"If that is so," replied Yishmael, "then we cannot possibly accept the Torah. If we cannot steal, then we will starve. Take the Torah and give it to some other nation."

And so it went, down the line. Nation after nation refused to accept the Torah, for they could not agree to live according to its laws. Finally, HaShem approached the nation of Israel: "Will you accept My Torah?"

The reply of the Israelites was brief and to the point: "Na'aseh Venishmah." (We will observe and then we will hear what the Torah contains.) In other words, not only was Israel willing to receive the Torah, but they were willing to do so before even knowing what it contained. This then was the nation that truly deserved the gift of the Torah.

The above suggests that the Jews accepted the Torah of their own free accord. However, this seems to be contradicted by a statement in the Gemara that HaShem threatened Yisrael by suspending a mountain over their heads until they agreed to accept the Torah. "Either you accept the Torah from me, or else you will all be buried there!" Did b'nei Yisrael then accept the Torah willingly or not?

Rabbenu Behaye explains that Israel accepted gladly the Torah shebiktav, the written Law; however, they were reluctant to receive the Torah sheb'al peh, the oral Law, as it contains many difficult concepts and commandments.

Other commentators explain that their acceptance was immediate and enthusiastic. No threats were needed to make the Jews become the people of G-d. When the Midrash refers to force, it pertains to the later generations of Jews.

We, who live now, no longer have the right to reject the Torah that was given to our ancestors. The transmission of the Torah to the Jews was meant for eternity and we must continue the Jewish adherence to its laws. Our ancestors were wise enough to perceive the great prize that HaShem offered and we cannot undo their good work by forsaking that gift.

In fact, the Torah was presented by HaShem Himself, and not through any intermediaries, even one as great as Moshe, to impress upon the Jews that the Torah is a timeless, Divine present. It cannot be changed by future generations, for it applies to all ages. If one were to alter any of the basic Torah laws, he would be challenging the wisdom of HaShem Himself. (Rabbi M. Katz)

The Maggid of Dubnow asks a question pertaining to matan Torah, the giving of the Torah: Why did HaShem not force the Torah upon the other nations as well? Surely, if HaShem had forced the nations, they would have accepted! The Maggid answers his own question with a parable.

A doctor was visited by a sick child and his mother. He diagnosed the child and gave the mother some medicine. A few weeks later, he was visited by the crying mother, who poured out her story.

"My son didn't want to take the medicine and I didn't force him. But yesterday, he died overnight. I heard that your son had the same disease, but you forced him to take the medicine and he was cured. Why didn't you force my son to take it?"

The doctor answered thus: "To you, I am but a doctor. I diagnose the patient and I prescribe and offer you the medicine. You should have properly administered the medicine to your son. However, to my own son, I am a doctor and a father. I give him the medicine, and I see to it that he takes it."

In the same way, HaShem is our G-d and our Father. He gives us the Torah, and if we do not accept it willingly, He forces it upon us. But for non-Jews, He just offers it, and does not force it upon them.

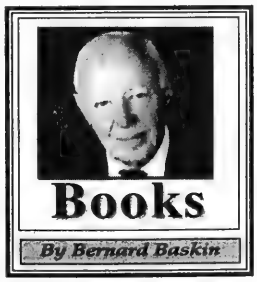
Can Diaspora Jews survive?



Why Should Jews Survive? by Michael Goldberg, Oxford $34.95

Jews in the Diaspora will not survive, insists Rabbi Michael Goldberg of Congregation B'nai Tikvah in Los Angeles, if they continue to rely on two uncertain and brittle pillars: the Holocaust and a secular State of Israel. As sources of Jewish identity they have already begun to crumble and will not be able to support or sustain the next generation.
